Naughty Boys

Because these mischievous miscreants, Penn and Teller, are large-type individuals, and performers of extraordinary and comic feats in their own show, it's generous of them to cook up this slew of amazing, comic, and usually disgusting tricks that you too can perform for your friends without benefit of Broadway. There's the already-famous "poke-out-your-eye-with-a-fork" trick, in which the alleged eye goo is provided by a small container of restaurant cream. There's the movie-date-defying one where you plant your large and scary hand inside the bottom of the popcorn box and garner a scream when she reaches for popcorn and finds this "monster" in there. Or you can drive people crazy by pre-slicing an intact banana using a hat pin — sort of a bogus Crop-Circles effect. Linguini A La Stigmata involves inviting "bloody" emanations, seemingly from your palm. With their goofery, and their oddly clean-cut sunny natures gliding along under their mad practices, Penn and Teller are really the Letterman's Lettermen, sticking it to vegetarianism, homeopathy, and good, simple manners. Short of doing a single trick out of this book, you can have a good read. Of their wonderfully tasteless Oliver Stone Melon-Head shooting trick they write: "One of the things that's pointed out repeatedly by conspiracy hobbyists is Kennedy's head jerking 'back and to the left' when the bullet hits in the Zapruder film. In JFK, 'back and to the left' is repeated enough that Ollie seems like he's trying to start a dance craze."

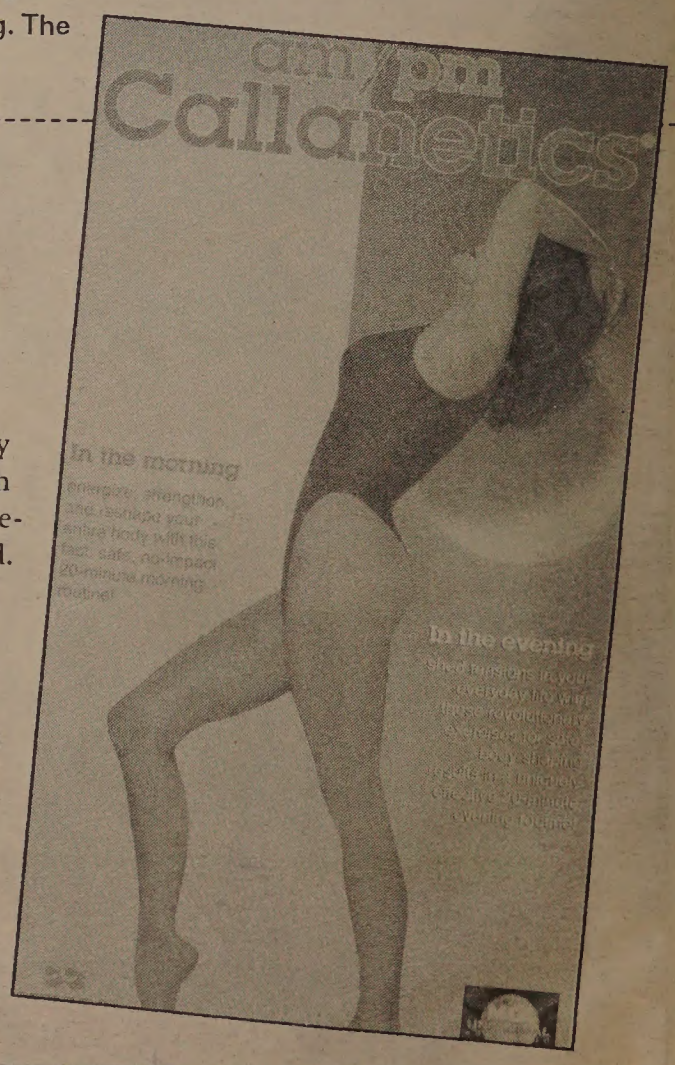
A Very Small Town Full of Friends, or Yes, Romance



The Post Club's waiting room scrapbook is full of rosy resignations offered because, as the departing members report, they have found "someone wonderful through the club" and are either settling in or getting married. Like most dating clubs, The Post Club makes use of a library of videos (also of photos and self-presentations) that range from the chipper, clean-cut and hopeful to a tongue-in cheek version of the same, demonstrating rather than merely announcing the person's sense of humor. But what makes this pleasant, inviting and relaxing place different is that it also operates like a social club, with parties, the theater and outdoor outings. The Post Club is also a focus for good works done in groups, (Their Have A Heart Benefit For The Homeless, open to members and non-members for $12 in advance will be held on Feb. 11) and even as a mini adult-education center, with seminars on astrology, self-defense, tax planning etc. This broadens the base of the enterprise and diffuses things away from an insistent bulls-eye focus on dating and mating to a more general involvement with a group or gang. The owners, Mark and Cheryl Goodman, who met and married through another dating service, cite as the active ingredient in their services the overall elevation of self-esteem, the perking and flirting and shining of the shoe on one's best-foot-forward. Such that sometimes, a member will use the transforming tonic gotten from their dating flurry at the Post Club, and go on to meet a mate elsewhere. Once, a much-requested Post-Club woman met a much-not-chosen man in the activity room of the Club. They hit it off in this real-life encounter and eventually married. The Goodmans, who "conceived" the Post Club on their own honeymoon believe that they are more catalysts and conduits (shapers of attitude and creators of possibilities) than introducers. Though they certainly are that too.

Give A Quarter of an Inch To Lose Inches

This is the exercise tape you may have seen at your video store with the word Callanetics written suggestively down the back and over the bump of the model's rump. Located somewhere between the un-bouncy stretch of yoga and the expansiveness of ballet, but nowhere entering into the frenzied territory of aerobics, this one-hour program named after Callan Pinckney involves easy, familiar postures assumed for the count of one hundred. Within those positions that include a form of nearly static sit-ups, leg stretches, hip and butt muscle exertion, and what she calls the "exiting pelvic rotation" — the exercise required is simply to move "one half or one quarter of an inch," while the numbers of repetitions accomplished are totted up on the side of the screen. The goal, demonstrated in some unretouched photos of one "Jean" (whose hipbones begin to appear in sharper relief after 19 sessions) is tightening, toning, and improving the "bottom line." (One exercise is said to "Turn your pear into a sweet peach.") There's an ongoing lower body fixation here (Callan's own trim form serves as a walking advertisement) with those recalcitrant saddle bags, hips and thighs getting a lot of attention. The spirit of Callanetics, and this makes it trancily inviting to push the tape to "On," is dreamy and slow. The exercise is microscopically tiny.

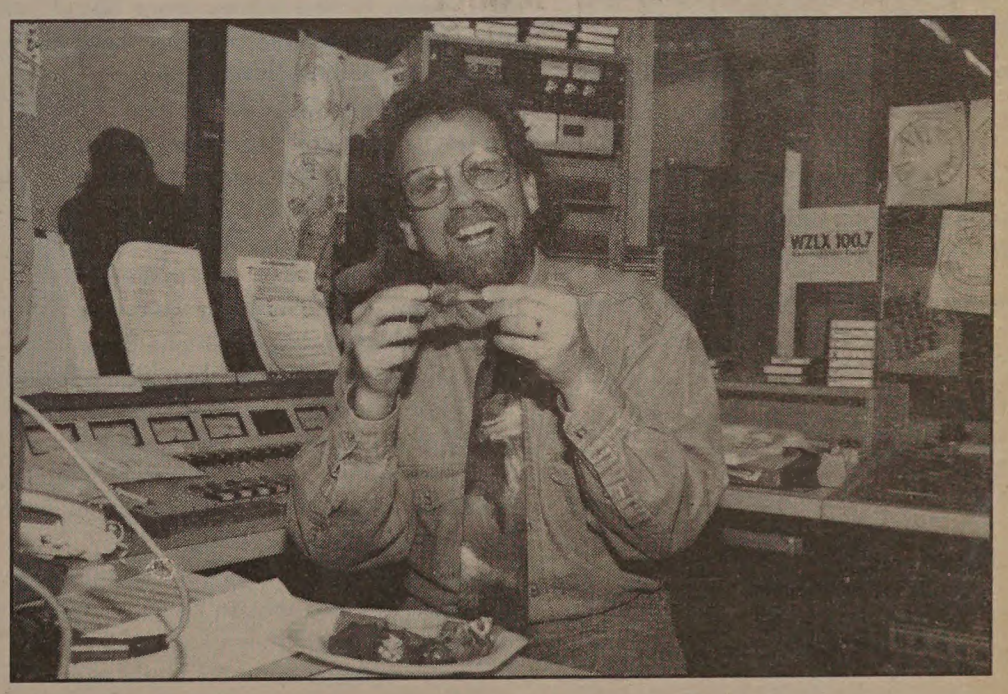
AROUND TOWN

Enjoy opera but I don't understand Italian? Here's a fun solution. The New England Conservatory Opera Theater and Opera Studio is presenting two one-act comic operas January 29,30 and 31 at the Emerson Majestic Theatre. This Italian double bill will be sung in English.

Rossini's Il Signor Bruschino is a comedy of manners which "takes longer to explain than it does to play" jokes stage director and conductor John Moriarty. Florville wants to marry Sophia, whose Gaudenzio has decided that she must marry the son of his friend, the irascible aristocrat Signor Bruschino. Bruschino Junior, is in an inn for not paying his bills, so Florville disguises himself as the younger Bruschino, fools Gaudenzio and marries Sophia before anyone is the wiser.

Donizetti's Le Convenienze Teatrali is a lampoon of backstage life, in which a baritone plays the overly ambitious mother of an aspiring young soprano. Set in a provincial Italian theater, Donizetti satirizes the foibles and pretensions involved in creating an opera. Tickets are only $10 ($8 for students and seniors) and are available at Jordan Hall Box Office 536-2412 or The Emerson Majestic 578-8727.

Keith Richards, the old man of rock and roll, solos into town "Stoneless" on February 12 to gig with his band the X-Pensive Winos at the Orpheum Theater. Coming off of their most recent album, Main Offender, Richards and The Winos will play selections from their new release, Talk is Cheap and most likely, tunes from the vast archive of Rolling Stones material. Playing without the Stones hasn't been as traumatic as one would think. Richards says, "I thrive on the loyalty of a band. I like the feeling of camaraderie, mainly because I'm used to it. In the early days of the Stones, it was us against the rest of the world. Maybe that's where it all sprang from — the early days when all we'd got was each other." We'll see. Tickets are $23.50 for the 7:30 show and can be purchased through TicketMaster by calling 931-2000.



Mikhail Baryshnikov and Twyla Tharp will give only three performances at the Wang Center for the Performing Arts in an exclusive Boston engagement. Twyla Tharp is one of America's leading dance choreographers and adds "Cutting Up" to her extraordinary dance portfolio. "Cutting Up" is an expression through movement of the evolution of social dancing during this century — tracing the history of dance from ragtime to the current era. This three-act performance features music by Sterling Smith, Hoagy Carmichael and Louis Armstrong. Performance times are January 29 and 30 at 8p.m. and January 31 at 3p.m. Tickets are available through Celebritycharge 482-6661, The Wang Center Box Office and Ticketmaster.

The Poet's Theatre celebrates Irish Drama in a series of events planned for January. A full production of Prayers of Serkin by Sebastian Barry and directed by Nora Hussey will run for two weeks, January 2-24 and 27-31. The play is about a small family who faces intermarriage to assure their survival under the threat of extinction. Fintan O'Toole of the Irish Times calls it "a haunting, evocative work...one of the new Irish plays bringing poetic drama back into the theater." A staged reading of Boss Grady's Boys also by Sebastian Barry and directed by Vincent Dowling will be performed January 25 and 26 at 8p.m; Tickets range $6-$15 call 422-1742 for more information.

Sample and judge Boston's finest wings and cast your vote for your favorites at the Bud Dry WingDing being held at the Westin Hotel, Copley Place January 28, 5-9p.m. Twelve local restaurants are putting their wings to the test to benefit Easter Seals. Admission is only $6 which gets you a sample of hot wings from each restaurant and a chance to win ski-getaway packages to Sugarbush and Waterville Valley-among other prizes. WZLX's Mad Max will be one of the celebrity judges and DJ for the event. For more information call 482-3375.

Beer & Brewing in Boston

BY CHAD SANBORN

President George Bush and President Bill Clinton have something in common. Here's a hint: more important than their respective turns in the highest office in the United States, this mutual interest hits closer to home for many Bostonians. As far apart as they may stand on the issues, these two good old boys crowd each other at the bar when ordering their favorite beer: Boston's own Samuel Adams.

You can bet that when Bush freely, though grudgingly, transfers the reins of leadership to Clinton, he will leave a few cases of Samuel Adams Lager for him in the fridge. "Have it all, Bill," the 41st president will intone to the 42nd, "you've earned the privilege to pass out in the Mary Lincoln-Todd-Bridges room here at La Casa Blanca." Or something just as presidential.

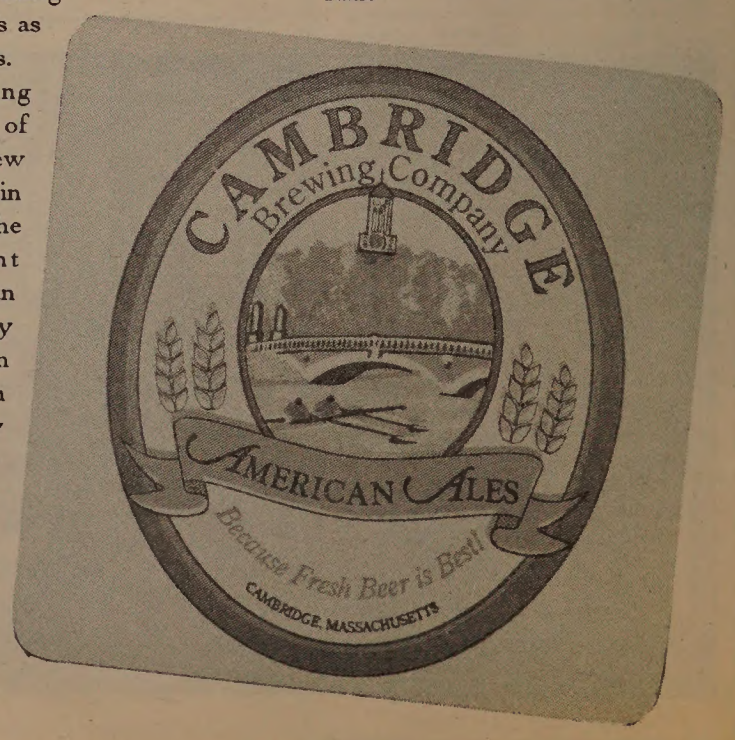
Republican or Democrat, these wonks inside the beltway are just figuring out what Bostonians have known for quite awhile. Some of the best beer in the world is brewed in microbreweries and brew pubs nestled right here in the heart of the Hub. Never in its glorious beer-drinking history – from the rabble-rousing Samuel Adams himself to some lethargic fat guy and his postal dork pal at the end of a sitcom bar – has Boston enjoyed such a plethora of malt-hop-yeast combinations.

When asked about the recent spate of presidential preferences for Samuel Adam's Lager, Jim Koch, uber-brewmeister at the Jamaica Plain-based Boston Beer Company and the man behind Samuel Adams beers, says he was aware of the Bush's affinity for the brew. Clinton's testimonial, however, came as a surprise.

"We didn't even sell it in Arkansas until about six weeks ago," laughs Koch. "He (Clinton) must have been bootlegging it. I hear his wife likes it too. There's hope for the country yet."

Having cracked the Little Rock market, Samuel Adams Lager – named "Best Beer in America" for four years – is now distributed nationally, Koch says. Along with sibling beers such as Boston Lightship, Boston Ale and seasonal beers like Samuel Adams Wheat, Samuel Adams Double Bok and the recently-introduced Samuel Adams Stout among several others, Samuel Adams is closing in on Koch's stated goal of being "the beer that made Milwaukee jealous."

But as the folks at Boston Beer take their pride and joy national, we here at home remain preternaturally wary. There's something about the taste of national brand beer, something tainted. Maybe it's grit from the money-grubbing hands of the accountants who allow profit margins to dictate the quality of ingredients. Or maybe it's a blandness stemming from the sterile, lowest-common-denominator marketing imposed on corporate brewmeisters by zinfandel-swilling marketing gurus. Or maybe it's as simple as the idea of beer in cans.



The Mass. Bay Brewing Company of Boston, brewers of Harpoon Ale, clings to its New England roots. When it opened in 1986, Mass. Bay Brewing was the first truly local independent brewery in Boston in more than 25 years. Though its market may be provincial – it stretches from the top of New England down into New York – Mass. Bay Brewing's reputation is world-wide. Nicholas Godfrey, director of operations, claims Mass. Bay Brewing has won more taste medals than any other independent brewery in the Commonwealth.

In addition to its signature brew, Harpoon Ale, the company also offers a European pilsner-style Golden Lager, a dry Stout, now available for the first time in bottles, and a dark Winter Warmer, among others.

Both Mass. Bay Brewing and Boston Beer Company offer brewery tours complete with the very-important tasting segments. In addition to its Friday and Saturday afternoon tours, Mass. Bay Brewing holds its 5:30 Club group tours every Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday. For Mass. Bay Brewing tour information, call 455-1935. For information on Boston Beer company's Thursday and Saturday afternoon tours, call 533-9080.

Of the beers mentioned in this article, Ironside Ale has the oddest profile. Ironside Ale, Boston-based Olde Time Brewers' single offering, is a local beer not brewed in Boston nor in the surrounding area. It's brewed in Kentucky, which, although a wonderful state in its own right, is as un-Boston of a place as you could hope to find. Still, Ironside Ale qualifies as a local beer because it's available only in Boston.

Taking a page out of the Samuel Adams guide to starting a brewery, Rick Dugas, who along with wife Jeanette owns Olde Time Brewers, says the beer is brewed in Kentucky for business reasons, the chief reason being that no local breweries would work with Olde Time.

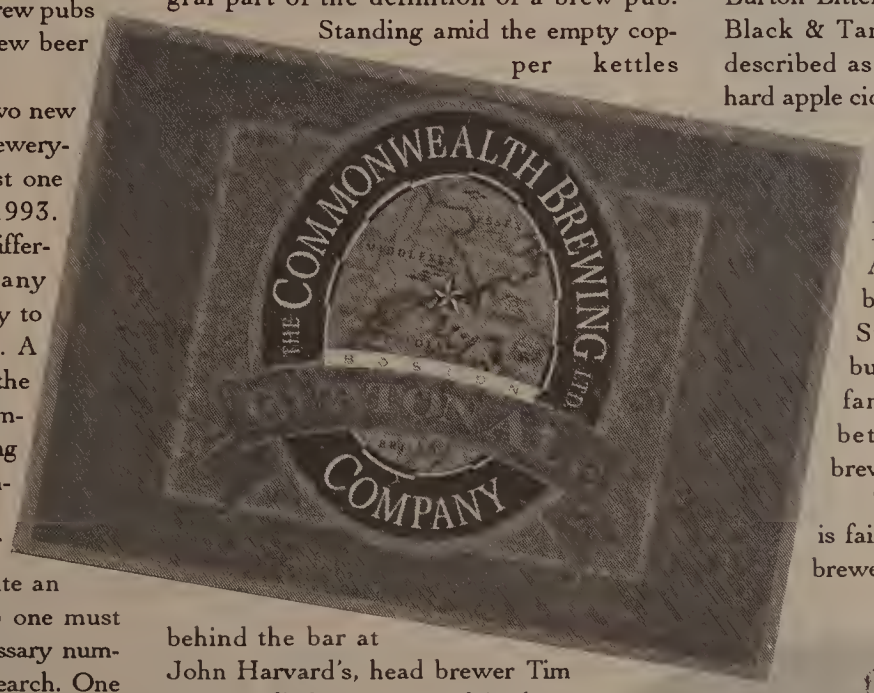
Beer & Brewing in Boston

"When we started we had our own yeast," Dugas says. "No local breweries were willing to culture a new yeast because that's quit a project. Then we found a brewery in Kentucky that would. It's the Samuel Adams philosophy. First you build the beer and the brand. Then you build the brewery."

Dugas hopes to move the brewing of Ironside Ale to the Boston area within the year, though he's busy enough just selling the beer, he says. Introduced in May 1992, Ironside is a recreation of an old English style beer, Dugas says. It doesn't have a high hop taste and is less bitter than some of the English-style beers brewed today. If you're anywhere in Boston, Worcester or anywhere in-between, Ironside can be found in kegs and bottles in restaurants, bars and liquor stores. If you can't find it, tough.

But there's more to beer in Boston than vast oceans of beer swimming in industrial vats at local microbreweries. Ah, yes, there's the smaller but just as delicious ponds of beer housed in copper kettles at local brew pubs — defined as restaurants that brew beer on-site.

Within the past 10 months, two new pubs opened in the ocean microbrewery-deficient Boston area and at least one more is planned to open in 1993. Furthermore, there are so many different beers brewed here that many Bostonians are drinking their way to the status of beer connoisseur. A seemingly self-contradicting title, the concept of beer connoisseur combines the pretense of discriminating taste with the common guzzle monkey's idea of a good time.



To attain the exalted status of beer connoisseur (or to even write an article about brewing in Boston) one must boldly face the daunting but necessary number of hours to be invested in research. One must give and give of oneself. Then, after visiting several brew-pubs and putting away many, many beers, the brew students eventually learns that the beer, and the brew philosophy it reflects are the only real differences between establishments. And that's enough.

Inexplicably, all brew pubs are done up in wood, with only slight variances in grain and darkness, and decorated with copper beer kettles, gunny sacks spilling grain, exposed beer pipes, dials, gauges and other brewing gadgetry. Visible from behind the bar, the presence of all this impressive brewing technology confidently reassures that, yes, the beer is brewed on-site. This is not always so.

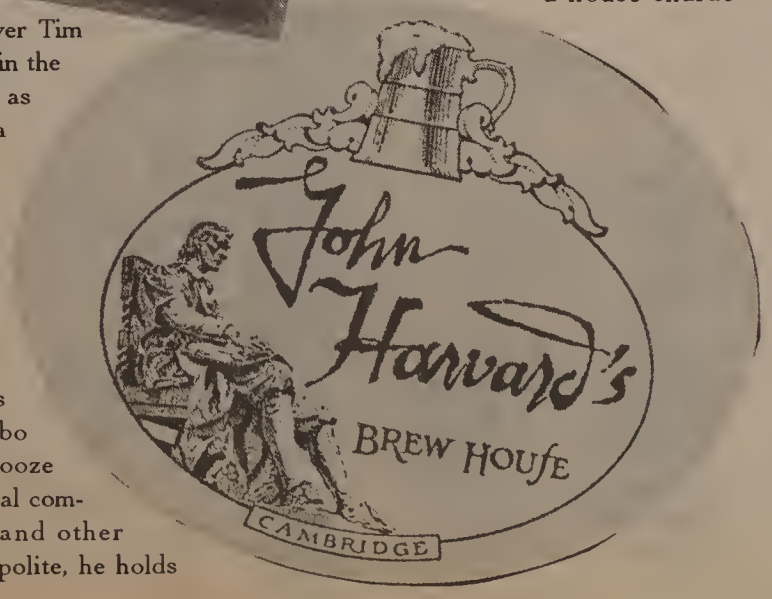
For instance, two myths surround John Harvard's Brew House in Harvard Square, the newest Boston-area microbrewery. One myth, striving to become legend, involves a tongue-in-cheek historical account of the pub's namesake and the nature of his legacy to neighboring Ivy League finishing school. The other myth promises to become a modern-day nightmares of legislative inaction and public relations' gray areas.

It seems that, thanks to red-tape in the monolithic Commonwealth alcohol bureaucracy, John Harvard's is a brew pub that doesn't actually brew its beer on-site, an integral part of the definition of a brew pub.

Standing amid the empty copper kettles behind the bar at John Harvard's, head brewer Tim Morse politely tries to explain the pub's "is-but-it-ain't" status, as if trying to explain away a bad grade or a dent in the car bumper. Despite already receiving federal approval to brew beer on its premises, John Harvard's is still awaiting approval from Beacon Hill.

Quickly, Morse rambles through some mumbo-jumbo about a Commonwealth booze agency handing down judicial comments on existing laws (and other meaningless jargon). Ever polite, he holds his tongue and stop short of blurting out the obvious: these kettles are EMPTY and it's the state's fault! First, term limits. Then, the New Garden. Now, empty beer kettles. And a rather Orwellian pattern emerges...

But the resourceful staff at John Harvard's are side-stepping the State's quagmire by brewing off-site at the Mass. Bay Brewing Company, those nice people who brew Harpoon. Thankfully, the John Harvard's staff can proudly provide their tasty examples of how they believe beer should taste.



Open since August, Morse and his crew offer several ales including New Town Light, which the menu describes as "a classic American ale," an Irish Export Stout that's exported to nowhere yet is similar to Guinness (although less bitter). John Harvard's Pale Ale is a nutty ale reminiscent of traditional English ales and available either cold or at cellar temperature. Rumor has it that John Harvard's will have its on-site license soon and Morse promises lagers to complement the ales by February.

With all this talk of the resurgence of brew pubs, due respect must be paid to The Commonwealth Brewing Company. Founded in 1986 on a philosophy that speaks for all microbreweries – "Let no man thirst for lack of real Ale" – its opening marked the beginning of the modern era for Boston brew pubs.

Conveniently located near Boston Garden, The Commonwealth Brewing Company offers a wide range of beers, from traditional Classic Stout and Boston's Best Burton Bitter, to such special offerings as a Black & Tan, a Shandy and a Snakebite, described as an amber ale with a touch of hard apple cider.

Boston Beer Works is the newest brew pub in Boston proper. Located across from Fenway Park and open since April 1992, the Works is owned by Marc Kadish, and Joe and Steve Slesar. A family-owned business of sorts, Joe contends a familial relationship also exists between Boston Beer Work's brews.

"The process (for brewing beer) is fairly simple but it's an art. Each brewer does it a little bit differently. That's how each pub develops a house character. You can tell our beers are a family."

Like Morse at John Harvard's, Slesar – whose brother Steve is brew master – contends that micro brewed beer reflects a particular establishment's philosophy of beer as well as regional characteristics. That, he says, is a major draw of brew pubs .

"Beer brewed here is a little different than the (microbrewery) beer in Texas," Slesar says. "Beers in New England are heavier. You come in here in the winter, all bundled up, and drink a stout. You don't get much of that down in Texas."

Joe describes the recent interest in microbrewed beer on the part of drinkers, both in Boston and nationally, as the outcome of the imported beer craze of the late 1980's. After having their taste bud's awakened to a world of beers, he says, they began searching for as wide of a variety of beers as possible.

"It's less pretentious and expansive than sampling different wines," Joe says. "The common guy or girl can try different beers and it's not a major investment. It's a return to basics and there's room for the basics in brewing."

Like all microbreweries, Boston Beer Works offers a core menu of beers supplemented by seasonal brews. High on the list of core beers is the Back Bay India Pale Ale, a traditional hop-lover's ale, the Buckeye Oatmeal Stout, a rich brew made of 20 percent oatmeal with hints of chocolate, and Boston Red, the brewery's signature beer.

As far as brewing philosophy is concerned, Jonathan Tremblay, director of operations at Phil Bannatyne's Cambridge Brewing Company, succinctly says, "If a beer doesn't have an after-taste, why drink it."

Located in Kendall Square, Cambridge Brewing's beers have a reputation for taste. It's the only brew pub in the Boston area that boasts Great American Beer Festival medal winners, Tremblay claims. Its Charles River Porter won a 1990 bronze in the Porter category (porter is a type of dark beer) and its Belgian Tripel was the specialty ale gold medal winner in 1992. Found alongside its Charles River Porter on the core menu are Cambridge Amber, described as a complex yet smooth amber, and the light Regatta Golden.

Turning four ears-old this spring, he Cambridge Brewing Company has relaxed neighborhood tmosphere and is the nly brew pub in the Boston area with a patio. That doesn't mean much right now, but not even Boston's winters last forever.

All things being equal, that' s a lot of beers on tap for Boston beer drinkers. That's enough beer to get you through a season of Patriot's football. That's even enough beer to help you through a long New England winter. Hell, that might even be enough beer to get you through a four-year hitch in the Oval Office. Now that is a lot of beer.

"WHEN AMERICA'S GREAT BEERS ARE POURED TOGETHER, SAMUEL ADAMS RISES TO THE TOP."

"There are great beers being brewed in America now. And when you pour nearly 500 of them in one room, one beer comes out on top: Samuel Adams Boston Lager.

"That's what happened at the 1985 Great American Beer Festival, where 5,000 beer lovers voted Samuel Adams the Best Beer in America. And the same thing happened in 1986, in 1987, in 1989, and in 1990, my Samuel Adams Lager won a Gold Medal again. So I can honestly say that every year it's been entered, Samuel Adams has been chosen the Best Beer in America. No other beers have ever won such awards five years running.

"The truth is, I brew Samuel Adams to be the best beer anywhere in the world. I craft brew it with only the four classic ingredients: pure water, lager yeast, two-row malt and Bavarian hops. That's all. It's so pure, it even passes the Reinheitgebot, Germany's strict Beer Purity Law. And its rich, complex taste is why Samuel Adams is the only American beer imported into Germany.

"So you can drink whatever you're drinking now, and be a good beer drinker. Or drink my Samuel Adams Boston Lager . . . and be America's Best Beer drinker." James Koch

Beer & Brewing in Boston

Boston's New Brew

BY ERIC PIERCE

Out of the vat, into the bottles and onto the shelf.

That's what has happened to The Commonwealth Brewery's newest concoction, Boston Burton Ale, modeled after the pale ale originated in Burton-upon-Trent, England. Though it's now bottled, the Burton is still available in its original "on-tap" form at the Commonwealth Brewery. The nutmeg-colored ale is the first of its kind in Boston to be brewed initially for on-premise consumption and later bottled and sold in stores.

Joining the likes of Sam Adams, Harpoon and Ironside Ale, Boston Burton brings immediate competition to a "local" market already filled with quality beer.

So will Boston Burton Ale be a force in the market? All it takes is a couple of sips to find out.

With sweet and bitter flavors that caress the palate, Burton Ale delivers a memorable taste. After working your way through its lingering and sturdy head, Burton's strong and aromatic flavors leave a fruity and brief aftertaste.

Burton Ale promises to be a prime candidate to not only challenge its more established local competition, but for veteran status in the American beer wars. Though it was initially sold in metropolitan Boston liquor stores and restaurants, President Joe Quattrocchi says that Boston Burton Ale will be "throughout the state as of January this year." Keep your Improper eyes open.

Are you tired of making a withdrawal from your savings account every time you want to buy a six pack? Are you tired of low-alcohol, low-calorie, cold-pasteurized, dry-brewed, lime-filled malts that taste more like seltzer water than beer? Then pay attention. It's time for a primer on homebrewing, one of America's fastest growing hobbies.

"YOU'LL NEVER MISS THE WATER

Legalized in 1978 during the Carter Administration's finest hour, homebrewing has grown to involve more than 1.5 million people, according to Karen Barela, vice president of the American Homebrewers Association in Boulder, Colorado. Barcela also notes that the number is expected to increase by 30 percent in the next few years. The AHA has its own magazine titled Zymurgy, (use that in your next Scrabble game), is hosting a national convention July 27th through 30th in Portland, Oregon, and holds sanctioned national and regional contests where local brewers compete against one another. That's my kind of contest: win and you get an award. Lose, and you get to drink beer.

The homebrewing hobby is popular because it's easy to get started, and is fairly cheap. There are a number of stores in the Boston area where you can get a brew-your-own starter kit for between $35 and $75. Add a few dollars for some equipment and ingredients and you'll be brewing for cheaper than a night spent partying at a club. Plus, you won't have to put up with being bumped around by a bunch of cadavers in black turtlenecks. Like any good obsession, home brewing can also be incredibly complex. Once the advanced homebrewer gets into developing his or her own beer varieties, the process can turn into something reminiscent of your worst Chem Lab nightmare.

There are three general steps to making your own beer: brewing, fermenting and bottling. Each step requires one basic piece of equipment. For brewing, you need a large (5 gallon or more) kitchen kettle - a big pasta pot will work. For the fermenting stage, you need a large (7 gallon or so) food grade container, with an air- or water-lock on the top. The airlock allows the excess C02 generated by fermentation to escape while preventing bacteria from contaminating the beer.

The bottling stage requires, naturally enough, bottles. You'll want to accumulate plenty of the older-style beer bottles with the pry-off caps. Twist-offs won't work. Since these bottles are often used by import brands, you may want to snag empties from a bar. Or you could always buy some and drink them empty yourself. See? You're already having fun. You'll also need a siphon called a "racking" tube that will allow you to move the beer from the fermentation jug into the bottles, some new bottle caps and a capping tool. All of this equipment is available at local homebrewing supply stores.

Once you've assembled your supplies, the brewing process is fairly simple. In fact, Dave Ruggiero, owner of Barleymalt & Vine, a local seller of home brewing supplies says, "If you can bake a cake, you can brew beer." You start off by boiling the malt in the kettle. Next, hops are added to the malt. This creates a mixture called "wort" which is what you smell if you've ever been downwind of a brewery. The wort must then be cooled to between 60 and 70 degrees Fahrenheit and transferred to the fermentation jug. Finally, add the yeast, close the lid and sit back. The container will bubble and hiss as fermentation takes place over the next few days.

Ruggiero notes that the most common mistake homebrewers make is failing to keep everything clean. All of the equipment and anything that comes in contact with the mixture must be kept sterile. Otherwise, bacteria will contaminate the brew, which ends up tasting like swamp water. A friend of mine brewed some beer once, and it tasted like a cross between sour milk and cider. So remember, whether you put a spoon down on the counter, lick your fingers, or scratch your head, sterilize everything that will touch the brew.

Once the fermentation jug has stopped bubbling, it should be left alone for a few more days before bottling. Clean and sterilize your bottles, keeping them upside down to prevent airborne bacteria from settling into them. Dishwashers work very well for this. Finally, carefully move the jug to a place where you can work around it. Try to avoid stirring up the sediment that has settled to the bottom.

Another alternative is to transfer the beer to a sterilized plastic bucket for bottling. Gently suck on one end of the siphon to get the beer flowing and carefully fill each bottle. If you're bottling from the fermentation jug, keep the end of the siphon out of the "trub," which is brewspeak for the sediment on the bottom. It's helpful to have one person fill while another caps each bottle. Once you've filled your bottles, you should have about two cases of beer. Store the bottles in a cool, dark place for another week before you begin tasting your wares. Total elapsed time to brew the batch: three to four weeks.

Under federal law, you can make up to 10 gallons of beer per person and up to 30 gallons per household if more than one adult is brewing. However, you may not sell your beer. Do that and you can expect to find a t.v. crew from COPS accompanying the federal agents breaking down your door. On the other hand, if you think you might enjoy jail, go for it.

Recommended source material for the beginner is The New Complete Joy of Homebrewing, by Charlie Papazian. This book is almost unanimously acknowledged to be the Bible of homebrewing. Ruggiero, who has been brewing for about 10 years, says "I still consult the book whenever I have a question about brewing." Another good source of information is the American Homebrewer's Association. Write to them at Box 1679, Boulder, CO 80306 or call (303) 447-0816. There are also a number of local brewer's clubs in the Boston area that provide programs for beginners.

Finally, if you want to taste-test the results of some of Boston's best homebrewers, head for the Boston Brew-Off this spring. Organized by Ruggiero, it's a sanctioned competition where the beers are judged on aroma, style and flavor. Best of all, if you get moving, your own special brew could be one of this year's winners. So get off of you keg butt and just brew it.

COMEDY

Out of the Madhouse and Onto the Stage

Cathy Ladman Returns to Boston

BY JACK C. MCBRAGG

The best way to get inside Cathy Ladman's head is to see one of her live routines. As one of the country's leading comedians, Ladman's one-woman act is a self-probing, anxiety-venting vehicle, designed to elicit laughs from empathetic audience members. She appears this week at the Comedy Connection in Faneuil Hall on a double bill with Rhonda Shear, star of USA's "Up All Night."

Since she was a 13 year-old kid, Ladman had always wanted to be a comic. Growing up with her family in Littleneck, Queens, New York, she would dream of becoming a comedian, all the while listening to albums of her most influential mentors — Cosby, Carlin, Robert Klein and her favorite, Woody Allen.

"Woody is my largest influence. One of my goals is that I have to work with him before he stops doing movies. I wrote him a four page letter and basically spilled my guts."

On stage, Ladman opens up about a lot of things, like using the public bathroom. "If the stall door locks and there's a hole in the ground, I'm a happy woman."

Some of her act is planned, but most of her truly personal material erupts during one of many frequent improvisational attacks on her life. "There's nothing riskier than to take a stand on your life," she says. "It helped me to grow up within my family."

It's also kept her fresh on stage. "I've learned how to make myself happy. I've learned that when I'm with one audience, it's different than all the others. It's not desirable to please every single crowd because all you do then is achieve mediocrity."

Ladman says that during some of her performances, she'll have a million thoughts cruising through her brain. She could be cracking a joke about buying enough Maxi pads at B.J.'s warehouse to last through menopause, while at the same time day-dreaming about an unrelated topic. "The things that go through my head on stage . . . my thighs are rubbing together, my thighs are getting fat — you know, things like that."

Ladman writes all of her own material, concentrating on topics from teaching, children and shopping to a major source of material (all original) — her family. They are anything but excused from her act, as her father receives the brunt of her personal and psyche-cleaning wrath. She says that you could effectively torture her "anal-retentive" father by "tying him to the wall and then refolding a road map the wrong way in front of him."

Ladman is also a compulsive shopper. "I bought a jock strap once and now use it to hang garlic in."

Though buying a jock strap for no apparent reason may be a sign to many people that this woman could use some help, you have to laugh at her presentation. Ladman is a pro at comedic timing and her delivery, which sometimes reaches breakneck speeds, is proof of a real genius at work. In light of her scatterbrained obsessiveness with life's idiosyncrasies, Ms. Ladman is also a specialist at relating those things that make the difference between a good day and a bad one. "A good day for me is when I'm doing my laundry and I get that lint screen off in one piece. Doesn't that feel good?" ❑

No matter what kind of day you're having, make sure to see her this Friday at the Comedy Connection in Faneuil Hall.

Tout Les Matins Du Monde

"A Sweet Lesson On Loss"

Alain Corneau's film is a somber, beautiful meditation on the nature of art versus commerce. The main character is Sainte Colombe (Jean-Pierre Marielle), a reclusive musician who lives the simple life in the French countryside, where he resists repeated offers to play in the court of King Louis XIV. His young protégé, the flashy, technically-accomplished Marin Marlas (Guillame Depardieu, son of Gerard, who plays Marias as an older man), lacks his master's philosophy and joins the royal court. But he returns years later — bloated, bewigged, face heavily rouged — and wonders if it is not too late for him to become the musician he could have. A sense of loss pervades this sad and moving film, with special emphasis on the loss of those opportunities which we recognize only once they have passed us by. A.L.

Trespass

"Just Plain Action"

The premise is straightforward enough — two Arkansas firefighters (William Sadler and Bill Paxton) find a treasure map leading to a hoard of gold buried in East St. Louis, Missouri. These two amiable bumpkins cruise all too innocently through the poor, predominately black city in their new 4x4: for some reason, Trespass's filmmakers never acknowledge the obvious racial angle, even when the two run afoul of a local drug gang (led by Ice T and Ice Cube). Director Walter Hill is more interested in dellvering thrills and suspense, and in a large measure, he succeeds. Hill is a aided immensely by Loyd Ahern's expert low-light cinematography, and by the beautiful crumbling buildings in which the film was shot — seldom has decay looked so gorgeous. This may be a silly movie, but overall it's a technically superior piece of pulp, well-acted and edited. A.L.

Chaplin

"Portrait of a Genius"

Richard Attenborough's Chaplin is daring in its scope, attempting to follow Chaplln's life from his Dickenslan childhood and training in British vaudeville through hls meteoric film career, ending with the famous comedien's final years. While Robert Downey, Jr. is up to the task, not just imitating Chaplin but emulating the Little Tramp and the young mogul, the film bites off a bit more than it can handle. At more than two hours, the film could have ended with Chaplin's deportation: what follows is fodder, bordering on the sentimental. Still, Kevin Kline hands in a good performance as Douglas Fairbanks, and the supporting cast of Charlie's family and friends is tapped from a fine well of talent. More might have been made of Chaplin's creative genius and innovation, but the movie remains entertaining and uplifting. T.S.L.

A Few Good Men

"Exciting, Moving, and Funny"

Rob Reiner hits on a fail-safe formula for his latest picture: big stars in a politically-relevant drama, climaxing in riveting courtroom exchanges in A Few Good Men, a film in which two Marines are on trial for murdering one of their own. Lawyers Tom Cruise and Demi Moore try to prove the death was accidental as a result of secret disciplinary orders from above. Tom Cruise reprises hls usual hot shot character role with élan, while Demi Moore hands in a respectable and dignified performance as an internal affairs officer. Jack Nicholson, while convincing as a hard-nosed colonel, tends to lapse into Nicholson-ese, playing the sly, smart-mouthed speechmaker. A Few Good Men contains decent comedy as well as moving action, and winning lines are equally distributed. T.S.L.

Body of Evidence

Sex and Fury Signifying Nothing

Lawyer Frank Dulaney (Willem DaFoe) becomes involved with his client Rebecca Carlson (Madonna), who he is defending against accusations of killing her rich lover with sex.

BY TIM LEMIRE

Central to any lawyer's case is motive; without it, peoples' actions appear senseless. Obvious, one would think; yet this simple fact has somehow escaped the creators of Body of Evidence. This latest, Basic Instinct-like sex thriller involves a lawyer named Frank Dulaney (Willem DaFoe) who is defending one Rebecca Carlson (Madonna), a woman accused of killing her rich lover with sex (he had a bad heart) after having worked her way into his will.

Professional discretion being what it is in the movies today, Dulaney promptly falls into bed with his client, a move that puts his credibility, his case, and his wife and kid in jeopardy, not to mention his self-respect. And all this for a romp in the hay with a woman who openly admits to enjoying bondage. Why does Dulaney do it? This is the central question left unanswered in Body of Evidence, and consequently, the movie falls apart. We never get into anyone's head in this picture, and as a result the sex isn't titillating, the suspense is suspended, and working up any feelings for the characters becomes increasingly difficult.

Perhaps not coincidentally, this movie does emulate— sometimes downright imitate — the successful sex thriller Basic Instinct, starring Michael Douglas and Sharon Stone. We begin with the same police-investigating-the-boudoir scene, leading to the interrogation scene starring the sassy blonde. What is ironic is that as awful as Basic Instinct was, it does in some respects have an edge over Body of Evidence.

At least in Instinct we knew why Michael Douglas' cop is obsessed with the female sex criminal: she's his match in machismo, the malevolent side of his character which he cannot face, and cannot escape. In Body of Evidence, neither the writers nor DaFoe himself give us any indication as to why Dulaney falls for Carlson. DaFoe's performance is tepid at best; he gives us no idea who his character is, how he feels about his wife (Anne Archer), or how he feels about himself.

Body of Evidence

Metro Goldwyn Mayer
Directed by Dino De Laurentiis
Written by Brad Mirman
Starring Willem DaFoe , Madonna, Joe Mantegna, Anne Archer

Rated NC-17

As for Madonna, her performance is as one-note as her monotone rap in "Vogue." Granted, she inadvertently lends the movie humor, like when she laments to DaFoe on how the jury will interpret her sexual tastes as perverse: "They've taken something beautiful between two people," she cries, "and made it dirty!" Of course this is a laugh coming from the authoress of Sex, but that's precisely the point: we're not laughing because of Madonna's character, but because of Madonna. We never forget we are watching the Material Girl on screen, and while this may be a treat for some, for others it's a cheat. It's sad when you consider how many capable actresses could have played Dulaney a thousand times better — Sharon Stone leaps to mind!

Is there anything, the reader wonders, at all redeeming about this movie? Joe Montegna does hand in a fair performance as prosecuting attorney Garrett, mixing humor with his usual charm and smooth delivery. Unfortunately, neither he nor DaFoe are truly believable as lawyers: they commit flagrant offenses in the courtroom, and object to one another like dueling samurai. The presiding judge, played by Lillian Lehman, is no help, doling out warnings ad infinitum; she plays the worst judge since Morgan Freeman in Bonfire of the Vanities.

If the review sounds vitriolic, consider the hype surrounding Body of Evidence and its promises: a torrid psycho-sexual thriller, an NC-17 rating, and big stars. When the movie fails to deliver on any wavelength, when we end up laughing at the movie more times than with the movie, we wind up feeling like the victim of a tease — and in this case (adding up the seven bucks and the fact that the viewer is left limp, hopefully with laughter), it's a sexual tease of the worst kind. ❑

ALIVE

A Survivor's Tale of Strength and Spirit

BY TIM LEMIRE

When a plane carrying a South American rugby team crashes in the Andes mountains en route to Chile, the surviving team of athletes, really only boys, find themselves marooned with little food, shelter or method of communicating with the outside world. Alive, based on a true story, is as much a tale of spiritual discovery as of physical endurance: at one point, the boys must face the moral dilemma of cannibalism in order to survive. Although comparisons between Alive and the book of the same name by Piers Paul Reid will inevitably cause debate about the movie (as was the case with Spike Lee's X), the cinematic product stands on its own as an inspiring and engaging tale.

ALIVE

Touchstone Pictures
Directed by Frank Marshall
Produced by Robert Watts
Starring: Ethan Hawke, Vincent Spano Josh Hamilton

Rated R

The young men who comprise the bulk of the cast will be mostly new faces to moviegoers, with the exception of Ethan Hawke (Dead Poets Society) and Vincent Spano (Rumble Fish). Because of this, the players are more believable in their roles than "Brat Packers" would be. With solid writing and fine performances all around, viewers are convinced they're watching inexperienced youth, struggling to decide what to do with their worsening tragedy.

After the first week of survival, the boys, not surprisingly, start to act as a team, with their captain Antonio (Vincent Spano) taking charge. They melt snow to make water, and ration what little victuals they have: chocolate and a few bottles of wine. There are heart-wrenching moments, such as when the boys see a passing plane tip its wings at them. They are sure that a rescue is imminent, and, while Antonio sleeps, they feast on the chocolate and wine. Oddly, the rescue doesn't come, and led by med student Roberto (Josh Hamilton) the guys are forced to confess. The furious Antonio, losing his leader's cool, grabs Roberto and yells, "Who are you to gamble with my life?" The tension increases with Antonio breaking down, weeping, "I can't save any of you."

We see each of the boys' personality types manifesting throughout the crisis: defiance, fear, spiritual reliance, agnosticism, indifference, and indecisiveness all rear their respective heads. Yet none of the boys emerge as stereotypes, and we grow to know them well before dispassionate fate weeds the survivors out.

Alive does tend to simplify matters by investing in one young man, Nando (Ethan Hawke), who demonstrates the most resilience and will to survive. It is unquestionably Hawke's finest role, and he presents himself as a promising lead actor.

Although the cannibalism scenes in Alive are not for the squeamish, they are not gratuitous or especially gory. Alive is a moving film, a story of strength and even humor. We follow the survivor's day-by-day struggles, marveling at this display of the tenacious human spirit and taking to heart this reminder of the fragility of our life on earth. ❑

FLICKS IN A FLASH

HOFFA

"Even Jack's Not Enough"

Considering the talent and expense involved, Hoffa ranks as a major disappointment. David Mamet seems like the perfect choice to chronicle the brutalities and backroom intrigues of the nascent Teamsters movement, but his script is neither here nor there: there's very little of Hoffa's private life, for example , or his exact ties to organized crime, or even a chronology - we're never sure what year we're in, or what city, or how old Nicholson is supposed to be (he makes an unconvincing 30 year-old). Actor/director DeVito doesn't help things, either. He doesn't know how to film crowd scenes, and his character in themovie is fictitious. Jack Nicholson does all right as Hoffa, but even he can't salvage this misguided, surprisingly boring screen biography. A.L.

THE MUPPET CHRISTMAS CAROL

"Highly Bearable Goofball Fun"

Michael Caine stars in this umpteenth re-telling of Dicken's indestructible classic, and he makes a serviceable Scrooge (although he's hardly "hard as flint," as one of the film's songs describes him). But the real stars are, of course, the muppets. Every muppet that ever was seems to have a part in this tale, and most of them integrate well; some are even clever and inspired choices. The muppets now belong to Disney, which may explain why this movie isn't as wildly inventive or subversive as the old muppet t.v. show. Maybe it's just the absence of the late Jim Henson. Nevertheless, this is a perfectly pleasant children's film; adults should have no problem sitting through this hour and twenty-minute production. A.L.

ALADDIN

"Pure Magic From Disney"

Disney Pictures have outdone themselves yet again with a sure to be classic in large part thanks to Robin Williams, lending his manic comedic talent to the Genie. The Disney animators keep pace with him, giving his imaginative rantings visual action, and William's rapid fire humor is only heightened with these visual aids. Although Princess Jasmine is as liberated as Belle in Beauty and The Beast, she cannot escape being drawn with comely cleavage and a 10-inch waist. Aladdin is a lovable poor boy, but where did this Arabian kid learn to give his monkey "five?" If you haven't seen an animated movie since childhood, go to see Aladdin to recapture a feeling Disney introduced to many of us as kids: joy. T.S.L.

PETER'S FRIENDS

"With Friends Like These"

Kenneth Brannagh's latest, about the tenth-year reunion of a disparate group of college friends in England, is an absolute stiff. The reason: Rita Rudner's glib and shallow screenplay, which she co-wrote with her husband, Martin Bregman. Lineslike "If there is a God, he takes awfully long lunch breaks," bear the indelible stamp of Rudner's crummy one-liner sensibility. Worse yet, this film also marks her acting debut, making it a one-two combination that floors Brannagh early and often. His acting is fine, but his direction seems mired in the script's banality. The one bright spot is Emma Thompson, Branagh's wife, who looks radiant, and displays a genuine flair for comedy. A. L.

"Lee , Washington Make Their Mark"

The epic movie X is an even-handed, engaging treatment of the civil rights leader that is easily the finest of Spike Lee's six movies. In addition to fine performances from Albert Hall, who plays Brother Baines - Malcolm's initiator into Islam - and Delroy Lindo, who plays Malcolm's crime boss father figure Archie, Denzel Washington steals the show as Malcolm X. To compare the articulate, iron-gazed Malcolm at X's conclusion with the hustling, slick-tongued Negro caricature at the beginning, is to realize the enormous talent of Washington. A voice at the end of the film asks, "Did you ever hear Brother Malcolm?" and "Did you ever see him smile?" Spike Lee gives you the opportunity to do so here, and "to do so" is encouraged. T.S.L.

PERFORMING OBJECTS

Interpretation at Its Best

"High Moon" 1991, Rebecca Horn mixed media

BY KATHY MATHESON

Welcome to this meeting of Art Appreciators Anonymous here at the Institute for Contemporary Art. Attending this gathering is the first step in the recovery program for pretentious art admirers. You were once taught that anything in a museum or art gallery must be important enough to warrant your undivided attention and admiration. But the ICA is a place to form your own opinions, a place where, upon viewing Bruce Nauman's Raw Materials OK OK OK - a three-screen video of a man spinning around upside down and repeating "OK" over and over - you should not be afraid to say, "That is not art, and I do not think any less of myself for saying that."

Then again, just because the objets d'art in the ICA's current exhibition, "Performing Objects," aren't oils on canvas does not mean they should be immediately dismissed, either. The words "performing objects" may connote some abstract geometric shape suddenly breaking into song and dance, but fortunately, art at the ICA is much more complicated than that.

One of the most haunting installations is Rebecca Horn's High Moon. Two rifles, suspended from the ceiling, are randomly spun - perhaps echoing the random violence that surrounds us today - and fed an ammunition of "blood" (red water). When the guns end up pointed at each other, shots ring out and red water spatters the walls. Below, a thin river runs red.

PERFORMING OBJECTS

Through February 21
At the Institute of Contemporary Art
955 Boylston St., Boston

Eerily, you can still hear the shots while viewing Dara Birnbaum's Tiananmen Square: Break-In Transmission. Her installation consists of several sets of suspended laserdisc players, TVs and speakers, alternately showing CNN and CBS broadcasts of the Tiananmen Square massacre, along with an underground music video of a song recorded by Chinese students after the rebellion. The assault on your eyes and ears is a real test of what you should believe, just like during Tiananmen Square when TV reporters would say one thing while Chinese officials would say another.

Bruce Nauman's work may take a little thought before any kind of appreciation sets in. It is very easy to dismiss Raw Materials OK OK OK (the man spinning around on TV) as completely ridiculous. But after thinking about it for a while, you may find it to be an interesting comment on the drone mentality suffered by many people with desk jobs — or even an illustration of U.S. Congress in session.

Nauman also has an interesting interpretation of the concept of accountability and an-eye-for-an-eye with his neon work entitled, Double Poke in the Eye. His third piece, Large Butt to Butt, a suspended metallic sculpture of two animals attached at their rear ends, really defies analysis no matter what the little wall description tells you. The title pretty much says it all.

Other exhibits featured include TV screenings of the BBC productions of Irish playwright Samuel Beckett's three plays Ghost Trio, Not I and "...but the clouds..." It's definitely for those familiar with Beckett's philosophy, if not these works specifically.

Peter Campus' Head of a Man with Death on His Mind is a 13-minute video of recorded tension. The wall text compares the exhibit to a man posing for a portrait: the painter records the best, single image of the person, but the video camera leaves nothing out.

Around the corner, Gary Hill's installation may be considered spooky at first, especially because you're afraid of stepping on it. Hill projects images of various body parts onto books that have been laid on the floor, thus characterizing, according to the ICA, "the transition between ordinary language and theatricality through television." OK, OK, OK.

Tatsuo Miyajima's Double Spiral runs through all three stories of the gallery: two slender black poles covered with spiraling two-number digital counter. Each counter goes through the numbers 1-99 at varying speeds, but what is being counted? Years? Days? Births? Deaths? Murders? Marriages? Your imagination may surprise you when left to interpret this.

Don't doubt that "Performing Objects" is truly a test of your definition of the word "art." Instead of just a random walk through the galleries, two things that will really enhance your visit are the orientation video that contains interviews with the artists, and the interpretive descriptions on the walls. (After all, in a place where a lighted exit sign could be easily mistaken for one of the exhibits, you need all the interpretation you can get.)

As you explore the gallery, your heart jumps at the sound of gunshots from High Moon. In your mind, you know they are just pretend, but a little thought will remind you that they could just as easily be coming from Beijing. Or Bosnia. Or Somalia. Or Boston. ❑

"Performing Objects" runs through Feb. 21.

STAGE NOTES

The American Repertory Theatre will be presenting the world premiere of "Cakewalk" as their last production this season. This is a semi-autobiographical work by Peter Feibleman about his turbulent 40-year friendship with the feisty, outspoken American author/playwright Lillian Hellman. The play will be directed by Ron Daniels. "The Caretaker," which was previously announced for that time slot, now will be presented in March. For information, call 547-8300.

"Arms and the Man," George Bernard Shaw's classic satire of romance, heroism, and social pretensions, is playing at the New Repertory Theatre through February 14. The action turns on a young soldier who invades a lady's bedchamber and is greeted by a barrage of chocolates. Kathryn Lubar plays the young, impetuous Raina; M.S. Rogers is the professional soldier; and Stephen Benson is Raina's naive and impudent fiance. Munson Hicks is the director. For tickets and information, call 332-1646. The comedy is also on the schedule at the Huntington Theatre Company, later this season.

In order to raise funds for 1993, Tina Packer's Berkshire-based Shakespeare & Company is offering a casebound edition of Richard Burdick's new book, "Next Time I Want to Come Back As a Yellow Bird," to the first 500 donors of $100 or more. In the volume, Burdick, a founding trustee of the company, describes his often-humorous adventures in the world of entertainment, television, and theater. For orders or information, write to Shakespeare & Company, The Mount, P.O. Box 865, Lenox, MA 01240, or call (413) 637-1197.

"A Closer Walk With Patsy Cline," starring Sandy Martin as the famed country singer, is United States premiering at the Charles Playhouse through February 14. Written and directed by Dean Regan, and co-starring Larry Blamire, this musical concert retrospective comes to Boston from Vancouver. For information, call 426-6912.

"The Wiz" will be at the Wang Center for one week, February 2-7, with original Broadway stars Stephanie Mills and Andre de Shields. To charge tickets, call 931-2787.

On January 27, Alla Demidova and Claire Bloom will appear in "Silenced Women" at Sanders Theatre in Cambridge. This is a tribute to Anna Akhmatova and Marina Tsvetaeva, two of this century's gifted Russian poets. For tickets call 496-2222 or Ticketpro at 1-800-828-7080.

HEARTBREAK HOUSE

Missing It Won't Break Your Heart

Jeremy Geidt and Tracy Sallows in "Heartbreak House"

BY NANCY LEONARD

This past June, David Wheeler won the tenth annual Elliot Norton Award for his direction of Misalliance at the American Repertory Theatre. He was cited for turning George Bernard Shaw's "wind into wit and sheer theatrical pleasure." Well, he's done no such wonders for Heartbreak House. Despite a visually stunning close, Shaw's look at the idle leisure class in England on the eve of World War I remains talky and ambiguous. This ART production is thoughtful but lacks dramatic punch.

Heartbreak House is a big, lumbering vehicle, with far too many things on its mind. Shaw intended Captain Shotover's ship-like drawing room, where the action is set, to represent the ship of state drifting toward the coming storm. Its inhabitants and guests fill their lives with irresponsible, self-centered romantic pursuits, and deride the politicians and businessmen whom they've allowed to govern society in their place. When danger unmistakably intrudes, their reactions are varied but ineffectual.

Most of the play suffers from lack of focus — part of it a deliberate Shavian depiction of the aimlessness he is rebuking. Characters come and go at the author's design, and converse in pairs on wide-ranging themes. The direction here tries to find meaning in a dynamic reading of the text. If meaning is still elusive, the vigor, at least, maintains interest. Yet, the play would have much more impact if suffused with a moodier artistry — something atmospheric to connect the whole and evoke perceptions along the way.

The specific action turns on the women in the play. Young Ellie Dunn has been invited to the country estate by Hesione, the Captain's Bohemian daughter, to be talked out of marrying Boss Mangan, the "perfect hog of a rich man" to whom Ellie's "bound in gratitude." Hesione insists Ellie marry only for love — though her own marriage has long since diminished to formality, and she whiles away her time with amorous flirtations. Shotover's other daughter, the "rigidly conventional" Lady Utterword, is an unexpected visitor, returning after 23 years because of some longing for the family she once firmly rejected.

As Shaw wends his way through attraction and heartbreak — and diverse other interests — Ellie grows into a strong woman. Quickly, she throws off the pain of unrequited love, and moves on to resolute determination. But it's a misplaced resolve, as Captain Shotover impatiently counsels. Shaw's stand-in, this eccentric, old sea captain/inventor recalls the upright past, when adventure and fulfillment were linked, and bemoans the younger generation's foolish, misspent lives. Courage is to be nurtured, not fear. Ellie finds the courage to stand on her own, but her desired "life with a blessing" may or may not materialize in the dangerous world fracturing about them.

If the ending is inconclusive, since the passing of the danger is as notable as the sudden fury, it's certainly stunning in visual terms. Derek McLane's drawing room has vanished, its few furnishings and its trio of tall, arched doors hoisted up high. A great sail, lashed tightly to its boom during the earlier action, has been unfurled, and now reaches to the top of a mighty mast. Surrounded by a streaky blue expanse and roiling waves, Captain Shotover is once again at the wheel of his ship. The younger people, clustered about the deck, face their uncertain future in a dying light. It's a stunning maritime tableau, touched with hope and heartbreak.

An ingratiating, articulate energy defines the performances. The talky evening does not lag, although it's pretty much devoid of emotional impact and striking imagery along the way. (This is a play of ideas, which are better understood through the program notes than the dramatization.) Jeremy Geidt is earnest and opinionated as the gray-bearded seaman, and quite funny in his eccentricity. Though slight of stature, he's a commanding presence, as Shaw intended, and believably wins Ellie's devotion. As Ellie, Tracy Sallows is a bit mannered but gracefully appealing in her growing strength and independence (that is, putting aside the few moments of coldheartedness through which she passes).

Margaret Gibson brings exquisitely vibrant detail to Hesione, the aging coquette. There's sharp detail, too, in Candy Buckley's Lady Utterword — her rectitude only a bit smudged by the delight she takes in manipulating her admirers. As Hesione's domesticated husband Hector, Royal Miller is all polished verve and agile posturing; but we never see the man under the pose. Jack Willis is good as Boss Mangan, an improbable role veering from ruthless villain to tender-hearted babe. Christian Baskous is good, too, as Lady Utterword's effete, lovesick brother-in-law. Gustave Johnson is fine as Ellie's selfless father. William Young's burglar and Patti Allison's housekeeper add further sparks.

Catherine Zuber's Edwardian finery is colorful and evocative, although the wide array of long gowns does summon extraneous thoughts of a fashion show. Howell Binkley's lighting is varied and effective. Maribeth Back's sound design aptly fills the air with music, explosions, and Shaw's "splendid drumming in the sky." This ART production of Heartbreak House is a dutiful effort, marked more by its energetic performances and inconclusiveness than by artistic inspiration or dramatic impact. You'd do well to read the commentary before the show. ❑

DANCING AT LUGHNASA

Rich Irish Culture in an Even Richer Work

BY NANCY LEONARD

There was a great deal of uncertainty as to whether Dancing at Lughnasa would come to Boston after its Tony Award-winning run in New York. Brian Friel's play, which had its world premiere in 1990 at Dublin's Abbey Theatre, was a natural for these parts, but a scheduled booking at the Colonial Theatre was an on-again, off-again, on-again affair. During the uncertainty, the Huntington Theatre Company, which staged the author's Aristocrats and his masterful Translations, sought the rights.

Well, the brief two-week stop at the Colonial should not deter the Huntington or any other theatre company from mounting this work by Ireland's pre-eminent contemporary playwright. Lughnasa is a leisurely play of subtle power. Its rich details - accumulating from daily chatter and a few special events - touch upon hope and heartbreak for one family and for the country which defines and delimits their lives. It's a lovely and lyrical work with a great deal on its mind.

The proceedings focus on the Mundy sisters - five unmarried women struggling to maintain a household in the village of Ballybeg. One of them has a child, a boy named Michael, who serves as narrator. Looking back from an adult perspective, he recalls the few weeks in August 1936 when the family was last together. The atmosphere - hope and joy amidst a sense of unease and change - is what he remembers most vividly, along with a few specifics: the family's new and often balky wireless, which brought music into their lives; the return of Father Jack, their uncle who spent 25 years as a missionary in an African leper colony; and two visits by his father, Gerry Evans, an itinerant Welshman of considerable charm and little character.

Kate is the oldest sister, a self-righteous schoolteacher, generally disapproving but not uncaring, and fretful about the future. Maggie, irreverently longing for a man and a smoke, cooks and tends the farm. Agnes, ladylike at 35, knits wool gloves on consignment, when she is not cooking and cleaning. Rose, who also knits, is the simple one, instinctively following her own desires. Chris, the youngster, is Michael's mother, happily succumbing to Gerry's spell whenever they meet.

Little happens in Friel's play, which is talky but very purposive. August is the time of Lughnasa, a pagan harvest festival marked by bonfires, dancing and berry picking. The Lughnasa customs parallel African rituals - both should have been swept away by religion, but instead have become firmly rooted community celebrations, meeting some basic human needs. Kate disapproves of the Lughnasa celebrations, and is shocked to discover that Jack's faith has dwindled amidst Ugandan ceremonies. But her religious rectitude counts for naught. She cannot control her sisters or the changing times - and even at one point joins them in frenzied dance (outside their view). In their privation - and Friel's narrative poignantly skips ahead to describe a bleak future - the Mundy family finds hope and comfort in the simple expression of dancing.

Patrick Mason's direction moves the evening slowly but engagingly along. (He won the 1992 Tony Award for Best Director, while his subject matter was honored as Best Play.)

With the Broadway cast replacements for the Abbey Theatre actors repeating their roles in Boston, the characterizations are nicely defined. Donal Donnelly is wonderful as the sickly, confused cleric. Pasty-faced and stammering to find his English vocabulary after speaking Swahili for so long, he suddenly grows articulate and animated when describing the joy of tribal rituals. It's a powerful moment.

Patricia Hodges is a straight-backed, no-nonsense presence as Kate, funny in her stiff dance, and funny when shocked by the others. Disapproval and concern live in her silent gaze. Jacqueline Knapp is an earthy, fun-loving Maggie, who stumps Michael with riddles. Jan Maxwell nicely plays the responsible Agnes, vividly complaining about unpaid servitude, and drifting belatedly into Gerry's whirl. Selena Carey-Jones is good as Rose, moving from brunette dowdiness to red hair and bright colors with imagined romance. Bernadette Quigley is the shy Chris, who flowers when waltzing with her adored Gerry. As the latter, Robert Emnet captures the wastrel but not the charm. Kenneth L. Marks is OK as Michael - though he never seems to be the little boy, since he stands out of the action.

Joe Vanek's set - a flower-dotted sweep of grain rising on a hillside behind the open farmhouse kitchen - is glorious, as is Michael Baldassari's lighting. The intermittent wireless music is by Richard Fitzgerald. Terry John Bates' choreography is apt.

Dancing at Lughnasa is lovely. Friel's play expertly combines memory, history, and Irish culture in a richly textured work. It deserves to resurface ere long. ❑

ANAGO BISTRO

Food with Affection

BY JONATHON ALSOP

Love and affection are the emotional counterparts of food and wine. When we really want to say "I love you," an expressive meal is almost always involved. Come Valentines Day, chocolates, bubbly and a batch of inedible flowers put physical form to our affections. The message seems clear: say it with food, but flowers are nice too.

Anago Bistro in Cambridge, open barely 90 days now, has all the food and wine/love and affection bases covered. Owners Bob Calderone and Susan Finegold, both the nice round age of 33, have been together since 1986 when they met while working at the restaurant Panache, which begat 798 Main, which begat Anago Bistro. "As a chef, you always dream of owning your own restaurant," says Bob. "When (the former owner of) 798 Main wanted to get out, Susan and I wanted to get into it."

In the kitchen, Bob works to produce a diverse and integrated menu. "I'm focused in the kitchen on maintaining quality and maintaining interest," he says. His style combines elements of Italian home cooking with the flexibility of modern and post-modern French cooking. "The basics are: it has to be fresh, it has to be flavorful and savory, it has to express natural flavors. The food should be hearty, but not off the deep end."

Susan manages all the service in the restaurant as well as the business side of things. "We love to eat out, and we eat out all the time," says Susan, "so we know what we like and how we like to be treated. We look for options when we go out instead of the straight appetizer-entree-dessert format. Our menu is really the way Bob and I enjoy eating most. A combination of appetizers and pastas and wines gives you more options, and you can be more creative."

Anago Bistro's menu features a half-dozen appetizers, three pasta and two grilled bread dishes that can be ordered in entree and appetizer portions, and six plated entree dishes. The evening we visited, we asked the our hosts to prepare the Anago Sampling Menu ($30 a person) so we could get a broad look at the menu. It worked out beautifully, although it was almost too much food. Another option is to craft your own more modest sampler from the menu. The wine list was quite good and very well-priced. We had the 1990 Abbaye de Valmagne, a simple country French white for $17, with the appetizers and a half-bottle of the voluptuous 1989 Guigal Cotes-du-Rhone red for $9, with the entrees.

Dinner began with an outstanding appetizer portion of baked vegetable casserole and native goat cheese with grilled flatbread and poached garlic. The goat cheese was very mild and slightly warm. The vegetable casserole was like a layered ratatouille with bright, lively flavors. We sampled an exceptional grilled portabella mushroom and asparagus appetizer with sweet red pepper oil. The mushrooms tasted smoky and wild, and the asparagus was fresh and perfectly crunchy. The sweet red pepper oil was a delicious puree of red pepper the consistency of a smooth mustard. Next came a plate of sauteed Maine shrimp cakes, fresh salad greens, and baked corn and sausage polenta. The polenta was especially good, nice and chunky, made of fine and coarse corn meal with whole corn kernels mixed in.

Two Entry Steps

Bob makes all his own pasta fresh every day and, in the two pasta dishes we tasted, his attentions really paid off. Our appetizer portions of linguini with sauteed Nantucket scallops and chicken raviolis with duck confit were very good. Tiny French green beans and pear tomatoes formed a wreath around the linguini, and the scallops were perfectly underdone. The chicken ravioli came with wild mushrooms and asparagus in a smooth, smoky meat sauce.

Normally, one entree would be split between two people as part of the Sampling Menu, but we sampled both the grilled game hen with oven roasted vegetables and the grilled venison steak entrees, which were both very good. The farm-raised New Zealand venison was surprisingly mild and completely tender in the same wonderful smoky sauce. Our game hen had a much wilder taste, and the bed of greens sauteed with garlic gave it a kind of Southern flavor. The oven-roasted vegetables were exquisite, especially the whole roasted beets. For dessert, we enjoyed a nice sampling of sweets: chocolate and rum bread pudding, Spanish custard with preserved cranberries, and tirami su with berry sauce.

When it comes to creating something meaningful, whether it's food or wine or anything, you have to love it to be successful. "I know I could make my life a lot easier," Bob says. "We could buy bread and buy pasta and give everybody the same vegetable. But that's not going to do it for us. We want to be treating people like kings and queens."

And that's a sign of love. ❑

DINING

IN VINO VERITAS

BY JONATHON ALSOP

WINEMAKER PROFILE: MATYAS VOGEL, VIA DELLA CHIESA

When winemaker Matyas Vogel remembers the wines of his youth in southwest Hungary, he smiles and remembers its inclusion at every table, automatic as salt and pepper. Today, Matyas is the 35 year-old winemaker at Via della Chiesa Vineyards in Raynham, and it's tough to smile through one multi-dip recession after another. He wonders what it takes to make wine successful in America. "We are 45 minutes from one of the great cities of the world. This winery 45 minutes from Budapest would have no problems," he says. "We knew it was not a gold mine, but.."

Today, Matyas and vineyard owner Robert DiCroce are working with a reduced staff and, most frustrating of all, marking down very good wine to the sincerely ridiculous bargain basement price of $4 a bottle, by the case. "For now, we are trying to educate the public about Via della Chiesa and build a reputation with wine drinkers," Matyas says. Via della Chiesa opened late in 1990, and things are much better now than a year ago, "but it takes time," he says. "We must be patient until we're recognized as a quality wine venture."

All of Matyas' wines are extremely well-made: very clear, very clean, true to the grape and well-balanced. "I try to make the wine the old-fashioned way of wine making," says Matyas. "To preserve the fruit, we want as little physical involvement with the wine as possible...no unnecessary filtering, no over-manipulation. This preserves the pure taste of fruit, as if you picked a grape right now right off the vine and ate it. It should taste just like that in the wine."

Matyas' '91 Cayuga-Supreme is a good example of a fresh, well-made, well-handled wine. It has a good deal of spritz, the fruit is fresh and explosive, and the flavor is similar to an Italian Tocai, but much more light-hearted in personality. His '91 Cayuga-Muscat blend is a delicious wine in perfect proportion and shows a little more wildness than the Cayuga.

Via della Chiesa grows 10 acres of Cayuga and buys Muscat, Zinfandel, and other grapes from California on the spot market. "It is very opportunistic," says Matyas. "We try to buy wisely, then also have a red wine to go with the Cayuga." Although Matyas' '90 Zinfandel is clearly well-made, it's kind of plain, especially compared with the vivacious whites that came before. Naturally enough, it just doesn't seem to have as much personality as the wines Matyas grows himself.

"We are working for public acceptance and recognition," says Matyas. "We are 10 or 15 miles away from a half-million population. If they come to see and have a life experience, they will prove for themselves that we make good wine, good quality wines."

Via della Chiesa is at 513 Church St. in Raynham; they can be reached at (508) 822-7775. During the winter, the winery is open Saturdays from 11 a.m.-5 p.m. and Sundays 12–5 p.m. From Boston, take 128 to Rte. 24 South to Rte. 44 East.

"TASTINGS AROUND TOWN"

Brookline Liquor Mart, Allston: Saturday 2-4 p.m. Blanchard's in Allston, tastings every Friday 5-8 p.m. and every Saturday 2-5 p.m. Winecellar of Silene, Copley and Waltham stores, Fridays 4-6:30 p.m. and Saturdays 2-4:30 p.m. Marty's in Allston, Saturdays 1-3 p.m. Bauer on Newbury Street, Saturdays 4-7 p.m. Kappy's in Sudbury and Mall Wines at Fresh Pond in Cambridge, Saturdays, noon - 6 p.m. Chestnut Hill Wine Cellar, in the old Chestnut Hill Mall on Rte. 9 by Star Market, every Saturday, 4-6 p.m.

"BEAUJOLAIS NOUVEAU DEATH WATCH"

Beaujolais Nouveau-years are like dog-years, one for every seven. That makes the 1992's almost two years old starting the New Year. For now, though, let's test the Nouveau and taste as we go along to see what happens to the wine over the next couple of months as the prices drop. My prediction: cheap wines cycle down hard. By summer, it'll be in the Discount Graveyard competing with Santa's Reindeer Ridge in the 2/$5 pile. I bought a test case of 1992 DuBoef Beaujolais-Villages Nouveau anonymously and at random for $75 at a little wine store where I never normally shop (just to give the illusion of scientific control). As of Dec. 9, it still tasted like new with two months of bottle age, which is to say, still young and juicy, still spicy, very clear color, bright and lively with lots of personality. But will it keep? Tune in next month.

"FINE WINE ON A TIGHT BUDGET"

Beacon Beverage, Brookline: 1986 Baron Patrick Chablis, $9. Previous years have been great, classic Chablis with lean fruit and beautiful herbal/mineral flavors; 1986 was a great year for white Burgundy, ready to drink now, only a couple of cases left. The slightly depleted Discount Basement (a.k.a., "Death Bin") at Allston's Brookline Liquor Mart yields mega-buys: 1988 Augustin Peyrouse Tavel, $6.50, a good buy on one of the world's best dry roses; 1984 & 1986 Mitchelton Cabernet Sauvignon, $6.50, big, soft, mature Aussie Cabs, just a handful left (I think I liked the 1984 better); 1985 Redbank "Sally's Paddock," $5/half bottle, legendary Aussie rarely seen in the U.S., big wine in little bottle, red Bordeaux similarities, kind of a stretch, but excellent as a wine gift and good for Aussie-philes and the really curious. ❑

Going to Extremes

Meet Boston's Wildest Homeboys

Extreme - Paul Geary, Nuno Bettencourt, Gary Cherone and Pat Badger

BY DAVID FENIGSOHN

Few Bostonian musical success stories are as dramatic as Extreme's rise to fame. After years of playing nearly every dive in New England, the band finally landed a much coveted record deal. Their self-titled debut sold respectably and showed potential; the band continued it's relentless touring in support of the album, and their reputation grew steadily.

Yet it was not until 1990 when their second album, Extreme II Pornograffiti (A&M) was released , that the band became international stars. That album yielded four hit singles, including characteristic Extreme rockers such as "Decadence Dance" and "Get the Funk Out." But it was the two acoustic numbers — "Hole Hearted" and the runaway smash "More Than Words" — which went into heavy rotation on just about every station in the country, from all-hits to easy listening to hard rock. The album sold over four million copies worldwide and the band headlined its own world tour. The MTV video further increased the band's fame, and to everyone outside of Boston, Extreme looked like an overnight success story.

Now Extreme are back with , Extreme III Three Sides to Every Story. Seventy eight minutes long, featuring the smashes "Stop the World" and "Rest In Peace," the album is both far longer and more complex than anything by the band's copy-cat competitors like Winger, Whitesnake and Warrant..

What has fueled Extreme's rise from being one of Boston's many metal bands to international superstars? Many attribute the band's success to guitarist and songwriter Nuno Bettencourt who is widely regarded as one of the finest guitarists in rock today. His searing leads are the backbone of Extreme's songs. But the rest of the band pull their weight: lyricist Gary Cherone is a competent singer, and a superb showman, bassist Pat Badger alternates smoothly between hard rock and hardcore funk, and drummer Paul Geary is as solid as they come. The band explores a wide range of styles, interspersing their hard rock with ballads, cabaret numbers and even flirting with rap.

Perhaps the only aspect of the band that overshadows their versatility is their ambition. III Sides to Every Story (produced by Bettencourt and engineer Bob St. John) is divided into three sections, "Yours," "Mine" and "The Truth." Each side has a different mood, thematically and stylistically.

"Yours" is Extreme at full throttle, pushing the boundaries of heavy metal, utilizing everything from samples of Martin Luther King Jr's speeches, to a cameo by rapper John Preziosa Jr. The songs, "Cupid's Dead" and "Rest In Peace" are intense and driving, the lyrics angry and bitter and highly political.

"Mine" finds the band at a slower tempo; the songs are melodic, the lyrics more philosophical, and the mood darker. In "Our Father" Cherone expresses his sense of helplessness with the line, "I'm in need of someone to tie my shoe, or take hold of my hand when I become afraid." The four other songs that make up "Mine" are equally introspective, including "Stop the World" and "Tragic Comic."

The final section, "The Truth," is different from anything the band has previously released. The three songs are all over six minutes long, with the final track, "Who Cares," checking in at just 8:19. It was recorded at the legendary Abbey Road studios in London and includes a 70 piece orchestra.

Bettencourt explained "The Truth" in a recent press release: "This was kind of a dream of ours. Most of the kids today never had a chance to grow up with some of the bands of the seventies. You could listen to a Yes record and go off on a journey. That's pretty much what our third side is, a musical journey."

Live, the band performs with intensity and vigor. Cherone may lead devout fans through arena rock clichés, but his performance seems genuinely sincere and spontaneous. Boston fans were given a chance to watch a "rehearsal" of the band's European tour late last year when the band headlined a sold-out WAAF listener appreciation party at Avalon.

Extreme is also doing their part to spread the wealth to other local musicians. The band hired Boston's Heavy Metal Horns to open for them on the second leg of their American tour and throughout Europe. The Horns add yet another dimension to big hits like "Hole Hearted" and "Cupid's Dead." ❑

Extreme play a pair of sold-out home-town shows at the Orpheum theatre on January 25 and 26.

Post-Holidays Jammed With Good Music

BY PETER CATALANO

There's lots of fine music being performed in the post-holiday rush. Try some chamber music at the Boston Conservatory where there of its young faculty — Michael Lenin, Lynn Chang and Andrés Diaz have formed a superb piano trio that will embark on a Far East tour immediately after their January 22 concert at the Boston Conservatory at 8 The Fenway in Boston at 8 p.m. On tap will be music by Beethoven, Copland and Mendelssohn. And at a mere $10, tickets are a bargain. They can be purchased at the door or in advance by calling 536-3063.

Meanwhile, the BSO will offer some unusual programs with sterling guest artists. Young, super-hyped Evgeny Kissin comes in to play and record the Rachmaninoff Third Concerto paired with the incomparable Music For Strings, Percussion and Celesta by Bella Bartók on the 21st, 22nd and 23rd at Symphony Hall. This is red meat for Kissin, and may be worth a trip, even though his debut recital in town was disappointing and callow.

It's no gamble hearing legendary Italian pianist Maria Tipo who performs the Beethoven Fourth Concerto with Symphony No. 6 "Pastoral" on the 4th, 6th and 12th of February with Seiji Ozawa.

Continuing its semi-staged opera series, the BSO performs Verdi's comic masterpiece, Falstaff on February 5, 9, 11 and 13. The cast is dicey in spots, but young voices of Dawn Upshaw and tenor Frank Lopardo along with veteran alto Maureen Forrester insure some sparkle. Tickets for all these BSO concerts range from $19.50 to $52 and can be purchased at the box office or by phone at 266-1200.

You might want to listen to some newly released recordings of Falstaff before the performance. The first is a re-release of the Arturo Toscanini version recorded in 1950 and has all the brio and nuance that you might expect from the maestro. The voices, however, are not the greatest of that generation and the mono sound is a little brittle, with the orchestra sounding baldly like a band.

Simultaneous with the Toscanini release on disc, RCA Victor/BMG brought a brand new Falstaff to market conducted by Sir Collin Davis. Rolando Panerai depicts the fat knight just right and he's the best thing on this CD though Frank Lopardo and Sharon Sweet do well on this disc. The conducting however, is not quite echt Verdi. That's why you are well to stick to the Toscanini version. ❑

Shocking Predictions For '93

Edited by Polly Campbell

It's the third week in 1993 and there's thousands of Elvis' in every post office and a Madonna song on every radio. So what else have we got to look forward to? We decided to turn this question over to some local music star-types. We asked them for their 1993 musical predictions, what they're looking forward to, what they hope for. Then we asked them if they thought there'd be an Elvis sighting in Boston in '93 and if so, where. Why did we ask this? Because now, more than ever, Elvis is everywhere. Had he stuck around in the regular way, he'd probably be enjoying a well-rounded retirement at Graceland, emerging for occasional guest spots on Sesame Street and golf games with former president Nixon. But since he shuffled off his mortal toilet in 1977, he's been the busiest man in show biz, chatting with psychics, monitoring Lisa Marie's recording career and showing up at every other MacDonald's. He's overdue for an appearance in Boston. We just want to know: what's going to happen, and where?

Jeff Conolly (Lyres)

"Because of the ten year cycle Madonna's thing is over. It's finished. In '93—she's going to try to revive her sagging career with an aerobics workout video. It will bomb. There will also be the first widespread reporting of disintegration of compact discs. A new trend will emerge where people prefer the sound of pops and scratches on vinyl to the disintegrated CD sound.

"The Elvis thing would happen at like 4:00 in the morning at Buzzy's Roast Beef. A limousine would pull up the King would get out and order a super boneless rib sandwich, with everything on it. That makes sense, wouldn't you think?"

Richie Parsons (Tomato Monkey)

"The return of 7" vinyl, it's definitely starting to happen. Major labels are using it as a promo item, but American India labels are producing it to sell, and that's what's cool. And I'm really hoping the Seattle thing blows over.

"The Elvis sighting would have to be in a suburban area, one of those suburban comedy clubs would be a good place."

Janet Egan (Malachite)

"Guns 'n' Roses will get rid of their extra members and try to do another Appetite For Destruction-type record,, and flop. And I'd like to see more women doing rock. The Indian Elvis will be sighted at the 7-11 in Central Square , Cambridge, late at night."

John Zewizz (Sleep Chamber)

"Madonna will get married again — to a man and a woman. Elvis has already been seen. He was leaving Hubba-Hubba after buying a full body harness, on his way the Joy of Movement center."

Sam McAfee (Chloe)

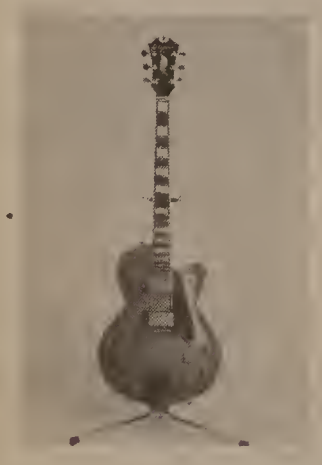
"Everyone will learn how to spell grunge. Videotape will become obsolete and everyone will start going out again. 6L6—they're a new local band to watch. They're going to be something else. Not too metally, not too punky — really good songs involved.

"Waltham is the only possible place for an Elvis sighting — I mean, where else would Elvis live?"

Patrick McGrath (Wheelers and Dealers)

"Here's a self-serving wish: that people will start liking that country music more in Boston, cause this is like the last hold-out against it in America. Also, I hope people will get into exotica and lounge music more, like Combustible Edison plays. It's just so nice.

"Our piano player Brother Cleve saw Elvis at this diner in Somerville that has Mexican food. Elvis was there and he said, 'Don't eat the chili baby, it's not very good.' Whether he'll make it into Boston is hard to say."



Dan Zanes (Del Fuegos)

"there'll be a renewed interest in the look and attitude and sound of the fifties. And I think there'll be a heightened sense of community in the music world.

"Elvis will be in the market down by the peas and carrots; Jonathan Richman called it years ago."

Willie Alexander (Persistence of Memory Orchestra)

"Getting my Persistence of Memory record out is my priority, for the rest of the world, I don't know....But I did see Elvis a couple of years ago on Broadway, in McGoon Square at the Dunkin' Donuts. It looked like he liked the donuts too, so he may be back there. Late at night, around three in the morning, that's his time to come in." ❑

NYC's Black '47 Widens Its Audience

By Rey Roldan

Seated in a corner table at the Trident Café on Newbury Street, Larry Kirwan doesn't seem like the fiery lead singer of New York's Black '47, whose passion enflames the Lower Manhattan pub Paddy Reilly's into a communal Celtic frenzy. Like Henry Rollins whose onstage persona is drastically different than Rollins the man, Kirwan isn't an explosive ball of rage, but instead a genial and creative man who leads one of New York's most sought-after bands.

Together for roughly two years, Black '47 has earned what most bands only dream about - a loyal following that builds exponentially. "We've been such a word-of-mouth band," says Kirwan with a slight Irish brogue. "We haven't really been played on the radio. Someone would hear the band and he'd tell his sister and she'd tell their friends and they'd tell their cousins. Most bands play Manhattan and that's it. We have really strong roots there; we play the whole five boroughs and Jersey and we draw from everyone from everywhere." Counted among the multitudes have been Kiefer Sutherland, Liam Neeson, Brooke Shields and Matt Dillon.

"Everyone knows about Black '47," said a poorly toupéed ex-MTV veejay Dave Kendall at a recent Lansdowne concert. "They're a band who people like, not a product that publicists create." While a large part of their draw is their excellent live shows, their recorded material stands strongly on its own. Their independently released self-titled debut sold thousands and received a 3 1/2 star review in Rolling Stone review. Their music also found its way to attract Ric Ocasek, who approached Kirwan for a chance to produce the band.

"It was interesing having Ric Ocasek approach us [about producing their album]," says Kirwan. "I asked him, 'How would you do it?' And he gave me a couple of ideas, a few which I have been thinking of myself, so I knew we were on the same wavelength."

The result, a self titled E.P. and a soon-to-be released full-length album titled Fire of Freedom on EMI, may very well widen not only Paddy Reilly's doors but also their audience, especially now when the music world is struggling to find an identity after Nirvana. Part Clash, part Pogues and a host of other influences, Black '47 does not try to confine its sound, but plays with each of them and finds a common thread. "Our roots were more of a mixture of traditional Irish music and rock," Kirwan explains. "Mine were more rock than [NYPD cop/uileann pipe and tin whistler Chris Byrne's] who came from a traditional music background. Fred [Parcells, trombone, tin whistle and vocals] went to Berklee where he studied jazz and big band. Geoff [Blythe, sax] was a Dexy's Midnight Runner with that soul-type thing. And [Thomas] Hamlin was more of a black and Latin percussion-type person. So, everybody basically plays their own thing."

Instead of splintering off in tangents, the songs like "Funky Ceili" and "James Connolly" hold together tightly, a direct result of "playing the songs every Wednesday and Saturday night for the past two years."

As an attempt to bring the whole Black '47 experience alive in Boston, EMI are busing up a pack of Paddy Reilly's regulars to their show on Sunday, January 24 at The Kells in Allston. "You'd think that there was a set group of people who knew all the songs and came all the time,' says Kirwan, "but we've played over six hundred gigs now and all different types show up. And the next time they show up, they bring their friends." He pauses, and searches for an appropriate comparison, which he chooses with perfection. "It's kind of like the Rolling Stones. It gets bigger all the time." ❑

ALBUM REVIEWS

Leonard Cohen
"The Future"
Columbia

With a voice like rusty blue velvet well-soaked in Napoleon brandy, Leonard Cohen has been drifting around since his folk heyday in the sixties when he sang such weary and irresistible love songs as "Suzanne" and "So Long, Marianne." He sank below the surface at the end of the seventies, reappearing in '88 when he released the acclaimed, I'm Your Man. Now that he's surfaced again with The Future , he's still writing quietly burning, hopelessly romantic songs, and it's that same rich, faintly threatening deadpan that slides through them. But he's also turning his formidable word manipulations outwards, casually intertwining personal melancholia with a view of the world beyond his own heart that sways softly between anger and affection. These mixed feelings run through most of the record, from the title track's bitter epitaph for the earth ("I've seen the future, baby: it is murder"), to "Democracy"'s checkered portrait of America. Having long out-grown his folk origins, Cohen's never looked for any particular category to fit his music into; on The Future the arrangements are smooth and slippery, filled out with synths and strings, reined in by precise rhythms and swept along from behind by the female heavenly choir that seems to have been following him around since the late sixties. Yet combined with his voice and lyrics, neither of these effects sound cheesy or overly commercial; they color songs like "Closing Time" and "Be For Real" -- and in fact Cohen's whole vision of the future — with an extravagant romanticism that makes it all seem just a little brighter.

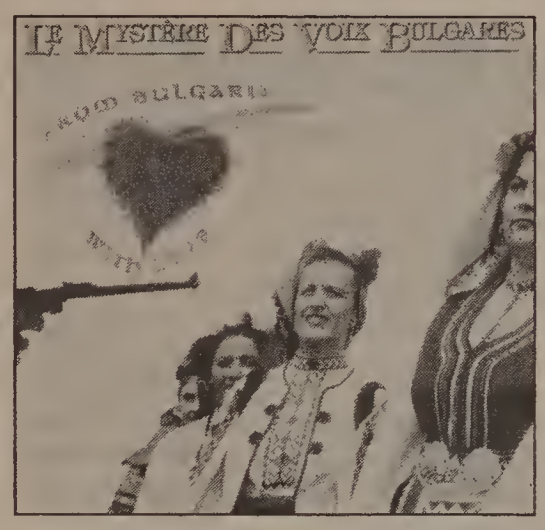
Le Mystére Des Voix Bulgares
"From Bulgaria With Love"
Hukapan/Rhino

In probably the most ambitious marriage of musics, Le Mystére Des Voix Bulgares combines centuries old tradition with Nineties beats. Unlike the faux blends like 1990's "Sadeness" by Enigma who blended hypno-house with Gregorian chants, The Bulgarian State Vocal Choir set traditional folk to techno and disco beats with mesmerizing results. "Pipppero" mixes C&C Music Factory's hard-edged house beats with the choir's multi-layered harmonies and Tanja Andreeva's Italian/English raps, adding a human element to an otherwise cold, machinistic sound. "The Balcanic" melts Middle Eastern vocalizations with a Spanish-tinged jazz fusion that sounds both otherworldly and natural. The blend doesn't always work which is demonstrated in "Plovdiv," an unsuccessful plunge into industrial art-house. Using the ubiquitous rave siren as a centralizing device, this track tries too hard to make an impact with its otherwise bizarre concoction. The rest of the album, fortunately, creates a fascinating amalgamate of Old World and New World characteristics that transcend language barriers. In this case, strange bedfellows make perfect partners.

Louis Cardace

Nirvana
"Incesticide"
David Geffen Company

This is not Nirvana's new album. Incesticide is a fans-only rag-bag of flipsides, outtakes and rarities, and it seems likely that if Nirvana weren't the Northwest's biggest cash crop, none of it would ever have seen the light of day. And the world wouldn't really be worse off. But since grunge equals gold these days and Nirvana are the original alchemists, we get to hear the edited-out steps on the road to Nevermind, and some of them are actually enjoyable.



Incesticide opens with a whole bunch of sing-a-long punk tunes, notably "Been a Son," "Molly's Lips" and "Sliver," in which Kurt Cobain combines angst and family values with the line, "Grandma take me home/I wanna be alone." There's also a sped-up, spat-out version of "Polly," helpfully tagged by the band as ""new wave."

But around the halfway mark the lights go out and Cobain and Co. descend into the primordial grunge soup, yelling, distorting and waving frustration around like a plug without a socket. "Beeswax" sounds like the whole band falling painfully and slowly down a very long flight of stairs. In "Hairspray Queen," Cobain yowls queasily about disco and Crisco and other unrelated things. This goes on for a long time too. Incesticide ends with a final energized blast of distortion over Cobain's charming invitation, "Come on over and do the twist/Love you so much it makes me sick." The song's called "Aneurysm." Love you too, Kurt.

Soul Asylum
"Grave Dancers Union"
Columbia

Halfway through Soul Asylum's third major label release, singer Dave Pirner's still worrying: "Will I be on the streets tomorrow/Will I have to beg and borrow/Will I have to go back to the job I left behind." Rumored to be on the verge of breaking up last year due to Pirner's hearing troubles, this is the album not many people expected Soul Asylum to make. But here it is, a nailed-down, pumped-out record by a band who, having fully grown into their music, can't quite seem to decide if it fits them. The big rock sound is kept so firmly in and neatly in place by producer Michael Beinhorn that occasionally one misses the ruts and bumps of their early Twin/Tone records. And Pirner seems to have set aside his unnerving ability to turn stories into rock songs (at its best on 1990's And The Horse They Rode In On), instead tossing hints of yearning and boredom and bursts of joy into word-piles, and whipping catchy melodies through them. But they're good melodies and they're good word-piles, and shakey desperation still drives his voice through a lovely and useless line like "Standing in the sun with a possible/Everything is possible" (from "Without a Trace"). "Somebody To Shove" and "Black Gold" are laid out straight as arrows, Dan Murphy's Big steady chords loping alongside Grant Young's low-riding beat. "Runaway Train" moves to the sad all-night sway of an unwritten Tom Petty song; "Keep It Up" is scrawled through with a chop-slop riff and eager, hanging-on-by-a-thread lyrics. These are the most lasting songs, but all of Grave Dancers Union is worthwhile, with the sole exception of the final track, "The Sun Maid." But as long as Pirner never writes another torpid, stoned and drooling song like that, I don't think anyone need hold a day job for him.

The Farm
"Love See No Colour"
Reprise

What made The Farm's U.S. debut Spartacus such a success was the spaciousness of the production. Love See No Colour is not so much a failure as a disappointment. Filling up every empty space with synth washes and excessive female backing vocals, there is hardly any room for creative exploration. Sporting a piss-poor remake of Human League's "Don't You Want Me" and a large amount of filler like "Words of Wisdom" and "Tooth Fairy," it's unfortunate that otherwise brilliant tracks like "Been a Long Time," "Mind" and "Hard Times" get bogged down with mediocrity. "Mind" especially stands out as what The Farm once stood for - creativity among the generic. While bands like Charlatans UK, Happy Mondays and Primal Scream wallowed in the clautrophobic psycho-delia, The Farm distanced themselves ever so slightly, but noticeably so, through concepts and space. Love See No Colour, with its lack of creative output, keeps The Farm from developing their potential and throws them back into the herd.

The Last Call Lady

Having a Ball at the House of Blues

BY LAUREN DARE

The House of Blues, Dan Akroyd and partners' tribute to the famous Blues Brothers, has already been open for more than a month, but judging from the size of the waiting crowd at 11 p.m. on a Saturday night, the novelty of this newest Cambridge night spot has yet to wear off. It was only with some slick maneuvering and throwing around of my "press credentials" that I managed to skip the line and head upstairs to the action. If you can't get your hot little mitts on some credentials of your own, then I suggest arriving early at the House of Blues for two reasons. First, you'll avoid frostbite in the five-degree weather; second, you can then exercise the option of eating some Texas ribs, buying your ticket at your table and missing the wait altogether.

Once you've "achieved" the second floor of the house, which plays host to live bands, you'll find yourself in a rather small space with a rather large number of people. When they say "House of Blues," the "House" part isn't just a figure of speech. It really is just a small house, with the walls and ceiling on the second floor ripped out, a bar and stage added, and about 100 people thrown in (including bartenders and cocktail waitresses). It's pretty intimate, and it gives the club a sort of warm and familiar feeling, and believe me, you can get pretty familiar with someone when you're squished backside to frontside with complete strangers.

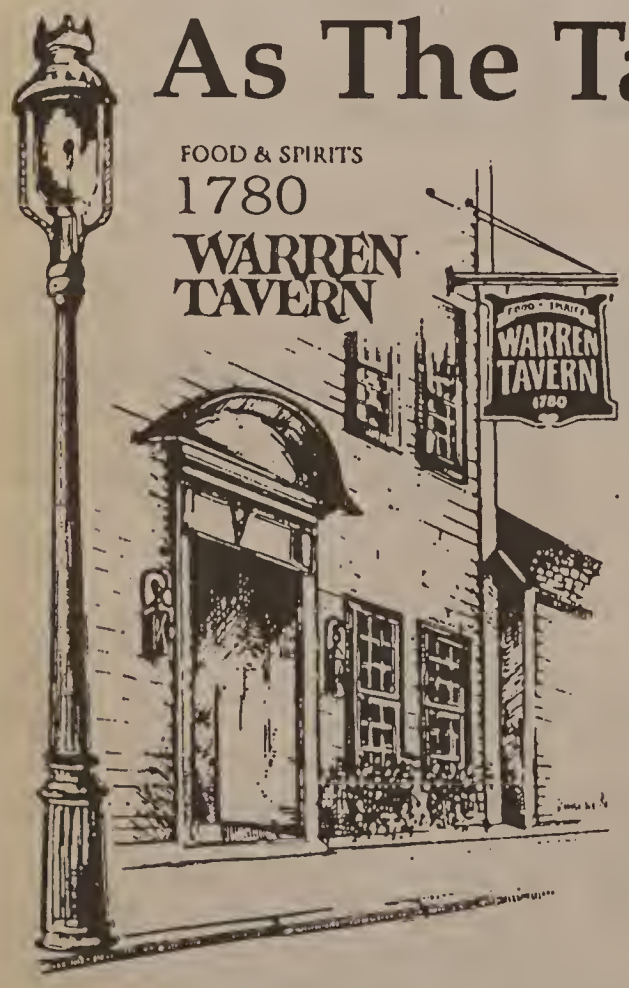
Speaking of familiarity, I had every intention of making it to the bathroom to check out the availability of condoms, but on every attempt, there were at least 10 people waiting in line, crossing and re-crossing their legs, on the verge of yelling "This is an emergency!" I didn't see how I was going to get in there. (Another helpful hint: make sure you go before you leave home, but then again, I guess this won't help after you've consumed copious amounts of Absolut and tonic.)

The band, which on Saturday night was Texas Slim and the Jims, or maybe it was Texas Jim and the Slims — I couldn't keep it straight — is almost on the same level as the audience, which contributes to the intimate, just-having-a-good-time-jam-session-in-someone's-house feeling. The Slim Jims were really rocking the house, and the audience, which contained surprisingly few people with facial hair and cowboy hats, was sweating and dancing up a storm. The crowd was mid-twenties to mid-thirties; they ranged from funky to clean-cut, and they all looked like the type of people who might be bored with nightclubs and typical bars, but who still want to go out, swim their way through some shots, maybe meet Mr. or Ms. Right Now, and have a raucous good time.



The only thing that might hurt you is the $12 cover on Saturday night (although it is less on other night, depending on the band) and the fact that the House of Blues, like the Olympics, doesn't take American Express. Despite these little drawbacks, the House of Blues is definitely worth the price of admission, so put on your Elwood Blues outfit and get ready to rock 'n roll, but remember my advice about getting there early. ❑

IMPROPER IMPERSONALS

Feel the urge to unleash your frustrations or vent your hostilities on an unsuspecting friend or enemy? Look no further than the Improper Impersonals, a forum designed for pranksters, irate neighbors, relatives, maniacs or any would-be target of your acid tongue. Best of all they're FREE! Send your Impersonals to us at Improper Impersonals, The Improper Bostonian, 17 Station St., Suite 7A, Brookline, MA 02146. Or fax it to us at 232-4305.

Tom C.,
You may think you're a sensation at the Park Plaza, but everyone knows you're nothing but a reject from the Thunderhead Club. Don't you think it's about time you got a life, and stopped you incessant weeping? Please go back to Ohio, you disgusting, crab-infested Baby Huey look-alike.

To our new dictator Kathleen,
This is an official warning: Do not overstep your bounds, honey. We find your treatment of the workers to be "totally unacceptable." If you don't shape up, we'll ship you back to Digital. BUMS

Chrissy,
YOU DRIVE ME NUTS! Get over Les before I die or else I'll remain fond of you and never fondle you.
The recent graduate
P.S. Wanna start a relationship?

Maddy,
I don't know what I did to offend you, but whatever it was, I'm sorry.You know that my loyalites run with the A.U.'s. Put the hat pin away and go find out what that crazy uncle of yours is up to.
-Agent T.

Christian,
Welcome back to Boston!
Love, Sarah

Someone please make the woman who runs R's Promise to put on some clothes! Whenever I go in she's in a bathing suit that reminds me of a dairy farm (because her hips look like cottage cheese). And when you pan up this shapely (and sit-around-the-house) figure, be cautious of her flailing, tentacle-like pubes that jet out in all directions like a sea urchin trying to catch a fish.
If she were ever to be with a man it would have to be a Dominican banana farmer: they're they only ones with enough machete skill to cut through that Hellish Nightmare of a pubic forest.
The Evil I

Jeanne,
I hope you can still recall our encounter on Martha's Graveyard. Where are you now? Fat and ugly? Fifteen kid? Five years of hell with me shoulda made you ready for anything. What's so sad about the past is it's passed. Yeah, tho' I walk thru Rudy Vallee, I will fear no Evil Knievel.
Hans Jobber

Dearest Bill,
Thank you ever so much for the Gucci watch you gave me the night before we broke up. It is the perfect representation of our relationship and will be a constant reminder of what it really was: FAKE.
Forever your ex,
Carla

To Chief Editor TS,
The spoons seemed to work – perhaps next time you could bring along a bohran. Keep those tourist dollars in Erin and leave the "U"nited "K"ingdom to what it is - "UK"ie.
Irish American and A Brit's Ex Wife

Carol,
If you haven't noticed yet, someone who sits next to you at work has a crush on you. Just look at his seat the next time he gets up to go to the copier. Oh yeah, and don't touch it, your hand may stick to the seat.
An Associate

Katey,
Let's "do" inventory every friday.
F.R.

Jane,
When, oh when do I get a look at the real you? Tight red dresses and black p-hose make me hotter than a buffalo in the African sun.
Guess

Bahahhhbry,
Rye ron't ruu tell me how to schpell my name az gooood as ru do?
P.T.

Laurie,
When I got to work this morning, I was told that I'd lost thousands on the market, my family died in a plane crash, my test came back positive and that it was going to rain tonight. I can handle everything, except for the rain. Can you help?
Lonely, Confused and weather-beaten

Ms. Power Hungry,
Next time you steal a marketing idea and disguise it as your own, you'll be a dead woman. Four years in this company does not give you the right to screw over your friends. By the way, we all know you're sleeping with Steve. Are you screwing your way to the top, or just on top?
You know

To the Captain,
Why don't you be realistic and make a New Years's resolution you can stick to? How about resolving to keep warmer during the winter with a sheep?

S,
Don't bother trying to beat me at all those games. You don't stand a chance. It's all just a trivial pursuit.

Begs,
Sorry I left the dynamite lying on the wood stove. It was just a tiny explosion. I wont do it again. Now forgive me and let me eat the Poodle.

M,
Seems to be taking fewer and fewer beers to get affectionalte. Or maybe you were lying about it in the first place, and you are a fuzzy lust puppy by nature. Next time you can go bottomless

OOOGO,
Where's that ad copy!? Being north of the border is still no excuse.
-Dave

Parovich,

Waiter! I'd Like Four of These Plates.

Going to Lou Lou's Lost And Found is an amusing adventure, because it seems more like an ocean liner in a musical comedy than a regular shop. And the gleeful grabbers figuratively on deck are having away at stuff you usually can't have (unless you're an unscrupulous diner who carries a giant purse), namely hotel and restaurant plates, glassware, chafing dishes, thick, silver-plated coffee pots, toast racks, champagne coolers, and the like (some new, some used). It all spells fancy dining, or room service, and the pieces are, accordingly, generously large and gorgeous. The huge dinner plates and escargot holders and cafe cups with their distinctive shape, the kind you never see on "civilian" cups come from such ritzy venues as Maxim's in Paris, Lasserre, Cafe De La Paix and The Grand Hotel (they may be here because the gold-leafed insignia was slightly wrong for the hotel). The English and American plates often have a rolled edge and a certain — though pleasing — solidity; the French plates tend to be thinner and finer. The plates sport any number of refined patterns or the snob-fluffery of the restaurant's famous name. Josephine Baker, Piaf, and music of the 20's, 30's and 40's floats in the air.

The Long Journey to Serenity

To address the problem that "people in recovery" may have in safely transporting the spirit of sobriety into that realm of the unpredictable known as vacation, George Waterman, formerly a recovery-bookshop owner, has devised Serenity Trips. These are weekend trips as well as extended vacations for people in any of the vast networks devoted to these "clean" principles — AA, Al-Anon, AlaTeen, ACOA, CODA, and people with addictions other than alcohol. It's not only a way for soberniks to bring their meetings with them (these are conducted on the cruise ship, or in the local library or church) but also a way to have a sort of cross-fertilizing connection with people from other related organizations. A man from AA can have a newfound chance to hear the Al-Anon side and, as Waterman says, "get a sense of what his wife has gone through," for instance. The trips include a ski weekend in Vermont (with the chance to visit the house of AA's founder Bill Wilson, also his gravesite on which the grateful have lavished a little mountain of sobriety medallions), a trip to Cancun and a Caribbean cruise. And, providing urgent contrast to the intoxication norms of the occasion, Serenity Trips also offer Sober Spring Breaks — often filled with the children, yea the roommates, of alcoholics.

Everywhere, Everywhere, Water

Speaking of liquids, this is a great "occasional book" to read in the bathroom. Someone allegedly named D.A. Rain has compiled this quirky compendium of "Facts and Fables for the Modern Reader" — about water. It turns out to be the active ingredient in many a thing — the filler, the squisher, the symbolic player, the refreshment, the mystery and the liquid muscle within things that seem to be other than wet. Take trees: they have to move water up from their roots to their tops. Some are almost 400 feet high. A column of water 34 feet high takes one "atmosphere" (about 15 pounds per sq. in.) to hold it up. The water not only has to be supported, but pushed upward, against the friction of the tree. So a force of almost 30 atmospheres is needed to do the job. Trees are awesome.
Then there is a Buddhist tale about a people conquered by a king who agreed to let many people escape while a prince named Mahanama stayed underwater. But since he tied his hair to the underwater root of a willow tree, everyone escaped. And then, did you know that "Hippo" comes from the Greek for hippos (or horse) and "potamus," meaning river: hence the word means "river horse." Or, did you ever think about the fact, given that the flip side of water's flowing allure is its tendency to produce rust, that water "serves a spiritual purpose" when it causes things to rust? Claims Rabbi Sol Bernstein of Brooklyn N.Y., "It corrodes the glitter that tempts us to lay up our treasures on earth. Water not only rusts; it rots, molds, mildews, and decays. It floods, it hurricanes, it tidal waves, and even throws out the occasional devastating hailstorm." How many words can be found in the little word "Water?"

Twenty two. One hundred and thirty six towns are listed whose names connote water. H, 2 Oh! There's a lot in this notion to swim around in.

COMEDY

Of Comedians and Platypus Men

An Interview With Richard Jeni

BY SUSANNE SCHANTZ

One of the keys to surviving in the hyper-competitive world of standup comedy is keeping your material fresh; in other words, always keep evolving. Standup master Richard Jeni has taken this credo to heart. He has been "Crazy From the Heat" during his 1991 Showtime special, that wacky Mr. Party Guy you see in the actually-worth-catching Certs television campaign and is the current host of the Arts and Entertainment Network's Caroline's Comedy Hour show.

But all of this is piddle next to Jeni's most recent evolution, because this time, he's become more; he's become...Platypus Man.

"I was watching a National Geographic show," he explains with his still-detectable NYC cadence. "They had on this animal called a platypus. This is a very strange animal. It lives alone, has very short legs, feeds at night. I said 'Wow – this is me.'"

At that moment, Platypus Man was born. But to Jeni, a thinking-man's comedian, that confused little mammal with reptilian habits was more than just a funny word to add to his routine. "It was a symbol," he says, "for any being that's contradicted in a comical way. It looks weird. It has these feature that make it look like one creature, but it's not."

It's obvious that Jeni has philosophically warmed up to his new character. "I thought it was a pretty good metaphor," he says. "We're all platypussian, if you will. The old rules don't work any more and the new rules don't work yet, so we're all wandering around caught between what used to be and what is. I've always been obsessed with all these things that are irreconcilable."

Just when you're beginning to wonder about this unexpected serious bent, Jeni slips back into the comedian role. "For example," he continues, "why is it that we're drawn to have a hamburger when the salad is the thing that's not going to kill you."

Jeni explains that he finds the platypus thing appealing because it has a little philosophy behind it. "I you're thinking person, you have to walk a fine line between trying to be funny and trying to say something. You always have the imperative of the joke. Comedy is like a steam valve that people have. Comedians are like professional deflector of people's emotions. That's why people have sense of humor; it's a coping mechanism.'

But seriously, folks. In spite of his ability to give dissertations, or maybe because of it, Jeni is very funny. His bad boy attitude, in hibernation when he waxes philosophical, comes cruising right out again when he describes his Bensonhurst background.

"It was like Good Fellas. I sat watching (the movie), saying 'I know that guy; I know that guy.' I think the first guy I used to do was Jackie Gleason, because that show was set in Brooklyn, so it was huge where I was."

You can catch Jeni at Nick's Comedy Stop on February 5 and 6 or on his "Richard Jeni, Platypus Man" special airing on HBO in February. Or maybe you'll see him on prime time: "I have a sitcom deal with ABC," Jeni laughs, "I'm working to make a pilot in March. It's a combination of Roseanne and Home Improvement. Every Thursday at 8 I drill a fat woman. Just kidding." Always leave 'em laughing. ❑

Featured will be a barrage of food and wine, accompanied by vintners who can suggest the appropriate wine for your meal (or meals). Hosted by Boston TV news anchors Liz Walker, Susan Wornick, and local pol/radio personality Marjorie Clapprood, the Gala features dancing, an auction, a raffle, and the presentation of the 1993 Spinazzola Celebrity Chef of the Year Award. Nominated for the award are chefs from Community Servings, New England Shelter for Homeless Veterans, Pine Street Inn, Rosie's Place, and St. Francis House. Call 344-4413 for tickets, raffle tickets, and information.

The creator of M. Butterfly and the Tony-award-winning director of such theater hits as Guys & Dolls and Six Degrees of Separation are bringing a brand new play to Boston. Face Value, David Henry Hwang's new fairy-tale farce about true love and mistaken racial identity will begin its pre-Broadway run at the Colonial Theatre on February 9. Produced by Stuart Ostrow, this production will run through the 28th with eight performances a week, including three matinees. Tickets range from $42.50 to $17.50. Starting Tuesday, February 16, you can begin to expect more from the Boston Ballet company than just a song and dance. It's called Informance, and it's their new Tuesday night series. "Informance" refers to a pre-performance lecture and demonstration which goes on just before the evening's performance. Held at the Wang Center, the first Informance lecture, titled "From the Beginning," takes place in conjunction with the Ballet's performance of Don Quixote and will be hosted by Artistic Director Bruce Marks. Two other Informance sessions will be held on April 29 and June 8, corresponding with performances of Cinderella and Prokofiev's Romeo and Juliet, respectively. Admission is free with a ticket to the Tuesday evening performance. For tickets and information, call 695-6955.

The 1993 Boston Wine Expo, taking place on February 6 and 7 at the World Trade Center, will feature numerous events including lectures, seminars, and tastings. Among these will be a discussion describing how the taste of a wine can be determined by the shape of the glass, a pre-auction tasting and auction of hard-to-find premium vintages by the Chicago Wine Company, and an ongoing presentation of premier vintages from 150 domestic and international wineries. Saturday evening will host a Special Vintner's Dinner at which host vintners will provide specially selected wines throughout the meal. Tickets are $25 for one day and $40 for both days. New England's Kinky Sex Scene Comes Out of the Closet

by Gary S. Kadet

The sybarites have descended. What was just an hour ago a dark and relatively subdued alternative music club is now packed with a pulsing throng of urgent bodies of all shapes and sizes. The music is the low industrial throb of a band called "Sleep Chamber." The lights are dim, and people are pouring in at the door.

It's the usual crowd. A plain woman — decked out in red leather from her stiletto heel boots to her vermilion trench coat — purrs as men service her feet with darting tongues, one for each boot. A dapper man in a suit walks about wearing a sign around his neck that reads "property of Mistress Luesha." A dark figure encased entirely in black latex known in the scene as "Rubber" stands amid the crowd, wrists and ankles handcuffed to a pillar. He can see nothing, and one wonders how he can breathe — his head completely sheathed in a jet black latex hood as permeable as a condom. Mistress Kimberly, a petite, auburn haired woman bedecked in a chrome and leather harness stands by him holding a riding crop in her hand. She looks at Rubber as if she owns him — and she does.

Dressed in a black catsuit, a knockout woman known as Variatio straddles the lap of a woman seated on a curved couch and kisses her undulously, while holding a leash around the neck of an obedient man standing by. The woman beneath Variatio also holds a leash attached to a man. Lantern-jawed and stately blonde transvestite Mistress Jennifer English accepts compliments on a new bustier, towering over most of the men there. Taller still and moving across the dance floor in a tight, leather cutaway skirt and signature smoke-tinted hose is Mistress Diana, a transsexual and former professional dominant who is this evening's mistress of ceremonies.

Mistress Diana, a shrewd businesswoman, systems operator (sysop) of the Fantasy Realization computer bulletin board, and a participant in the international scene for five years (in such B&D publications as Dominant Directory International and Latent Image) doesn't need to announce it. The gilt throne that club management has set up for her on stage and the rapt attention of the crowd hanging on her every word says it all: she is clearly queen of "the scene."

And what is "the scene?" Alternative, kinky sex, of course: bondage, dominance and submission, sadomasochistic role-playing, gender-bending — all of which, despite the glacial plague of AIDS and the subzero moral climate is alive and well and kicking up its booted heels, not just in New York, and LA, but here in Cambridge, Massachusetts.

The above scenario describes "Fantasy Night" at Man Ray, a twice-monthly event dedicated to B&D, S&M, D&S (dominance and submission) and all their adjuncts that is so successful, club owner Don Holland has devoted two Friday nights out of four a month to it (as well as the Sundays that fall before Monday holidays). New Years Eve, certainly a big night for all clubs, if not the biggest, pulled in a crowd of about 600 people at Man Ray

Out of the loop about the right sexual poop? Need a review on the 90s screw? (All right, all right, I'll stop.) A short guide to sexual terminology in the 90s:

Blue Balls - n. - Fictional compromising male genital condition, usually associated with coitus interruptus.

this year. Mistress Diana's Annual B&D Fetish Ball brought in 900 — and now, she and her business partner Bianca have to find a bigger venue because Man Ray simply cannot house the capacity crowd.

For those who think that this is a momentary fad observable in the megalopolises and secondary urban pockets, guess again. It's on TV, in magazines, newspapers and on the backs of some of the best-dressed people in town. In the 60s we had radical chic. Now, in the 90s, we have S&M chic.

A recent LA Law episode included a segment dealing with a professional mistress whose submissive client died of a heart attack during a session or "scene." According to Mistress Diana, this is extremely rare. But yet, the show did tell some truths. Sessions or scenes do not as a rule include sex, but instead may focus on whipping, in various degrees of severity, spanking, or other forms of "play," such as foot-worship. The show had its mistress cite the dropping of a ping-pong ball from the hand of a submissive as the signal for time-out. And while this is a dramatic device, the rule in any "scene" is safety, most often expressed by a code or "safe" word.

The national image of "the scene" is with us: Phil Donahue being dominated by the world-renown Mistress Antoinette of LA to wear a dress on his show, Spy Magazine running Hillary Clinton in black, patent-leather fetish-wear (who a visit-to-the-white-house lottery winner from Cambridge recently described as "The First Attorney") — even prim little Mademoiselle has devoted a grudging column-cum-article to S&M in its February 1993 issue called "Hurting the One You Love." Mademoiselle does not approve, but for the enlightenment (read titillation) of its readers, it did include a rundown of professional dominance sessions; piercing and haute couturier Gianni Versace's S&M evening wear (Sylvester Stallone is a client). And of course, there is always the omnipresent Madonna, whom the article describes as "an idiot...breezy as spring about other people's pain."

Mistress Diana pointed out that three of the heaviest rubber, latex and PVC fetish magazines "Rubberist," "Skin Two" and "<<O>>" can be ordered from the back of current issues of Cosmopolitan Magazine.

"Phil Donohue has done more for the B&D scene than anybody I can think of," observes Lady Bianca wryly.

Even local celebrity DJ Oedipus of mainstream rock station WBCN and its "Nocturnal Emissions" show has taken part in the scene. He was emcee for the first B&D fetish ball held last May, where the local emergence of "the scene" as public event began.

"It was fun. It was so much fun that I will be emceeing the Second Annual B&D Fetish Ball," Oedipus commented from the offices of WBCN. "There is so much sameness going on in bands and music, when they asked me to do this, it was the opportunity to explore something that was entirely different. When they tied Slave Ian up at the very beginning of the fashion show and the rest of the models proceeded to use him as a prop, that was quite interesting. And I've been involved with Suzy over at Hubba Hubba since my show at WTBS, now WMBR, was the first punk rock show in the country back in the 70s. It's my favorite store in Boston. The fashion is my style. So, I had the opportunity not only to emcee the show, but present the fashions that I love and have an affiliation with them." According to Oedipus, B&D-related is the logical outgrowth of punk rock.

And the ball was the logical outgrowth of Mistress Diana's computer BBS, which has so galvanized New England's emerging D&S community. Lady Bianca, an equal partner with Diana in their growing business, F.R. Communications, and a well-regarded dominatrix in her own right, put it succinctly: "The D&S community is where the gay community was maybe 30-years ago. People are beginning to come out of the closet.

"There's just such a big need for it," says Mistress Diana of her Fantasy

The Missing Linkup

Cybersex In New England

by Gary S. Kadet

If there must be a singles bar equivalent for each decade past the 70s, then for the 90s it has to be the computer BBS and its electronic meeting place, teleconference link-up. It's a simple concept: a user hooks his/her computer up to a phone line via modem. After the user selects a "handle" (a nickname for broadcast purposes, a la CB) and a memorable password to allow only exclusive access to the account, the user is ready to comingle and slosh around in an electronic hot tub of sorts with an entire society of people who might otherwise never have met.

There are local BBSs strictly for the purpose of downloading files. These range from Channel 1 (354-2505) to the various extensions of the Boston Computer Society. Cybersex BBSs, however, are not as many but are multiplying fast.

The best in the area would have to be F.R. Communications Fantasy Realization BBS, the operative nucleus of the D&S/kinky sexy community in New England (397-8844). It isn't so much the boiler-plate Galacticomm software that the board runs, as the people who frequent it that makes it so good. Imagine a bar that you can open at virtually anytime in your own home, fraternize with interesting and sometimes dangerously exciting characters at no personal risk whatsoever — as long as you remember to keep your password and other such information to yourself. Unlike phone sex trunklines, you don't hear the same droning questions "What do you look like?" and "What are you into?" An area of the system called "The Registry of Users" takes care of all basic questions. A user is encouraged to fill out a "reg" (registry form) first thing, which then can be accessed for perusal from almost anywhere in the system with a simple "/r username" command.

With a simple "chat" command, you can break off into privacy for an intimate conversation between you and one other partner, from the general hubbub of the teleconference channel. You can even commandeer one of 50,000 odd channels for yourself, designate a topic and invite a few chosen play partners in with you.

And should there be no fascinating personages on-line with whom you wish to talk, there are little corners of the system called SIGs (special interest groups) with correspondence and related textfiles easily downloaded to your computer by a variety of protocols — either to disk or direct to screen on such matters as B&D, Raunch, Catfights or even Acronyms (to help new users with "tele-speak" — keyboard shorthand for common phrases such as LOL (laughing out loud, afk (away from keyboard), BTW (by the way) and re Realization Bulletin Board "I found out about the English Palacer a B&D BBS based in New Jersey about three years ago. And I had a submissive from Florida, who was also a member of the bulletin board, and he wanted desperately for me to come to Florida. But I said, 'I really can't go down to Florida to just to see one person, I'd like to come down and see five or six at a time and get a lot of clients for my weekend, my flight and my time.' So, together, we came up with the idea of starting a bulletin. He asked me if he could use my name, and that way I could drum up clients in Florida, and then I could fly down there. He would be the sysop. It was called 'Mistress Diana's Web of Desire.' In my old dungeon I had a big web on the wall, you see.

Diana was quick to point out that, though she did indeed have a dungeon, she had to close it down. "You can't have it here. It's the law. If I were to have a dungeon in there, they would come in here and tag everything, the computers and the modems, as evidence. They would impound everything and in a couple of years I might get it back. I no longer do professional sessions. If you were to say, 'Please spank me right now,' and I were to start spanking you and a cop walked in, I could be arrested for assault and battery, assault with a deadly weapon, even if you didn't want to press charges, the state would press charges — as it has many times. What I do now is way more important than being a professional dominant."

Sitting in the offices of FR Communications, the nerve-center of the area "scene" in a bedroom community just outside Boston, one could be in the office of any start-up company run out of a home: housecleaning, catering, nanny referral. Lady Bianca handles some business over the phone and monitors the various computers. In addition to tending to F.R. business, Bianca is also a new mother.

Diana, who is dressed in a red blouse and slacks with rimless glasses, is chain-smoking a bit — presumably due to the stress of a long interview added to her business day. The only thing that sets this office apart is a morgue library of B&D publications and national directories of mistresses, masters, fetishes and the "scenes" of other regions. That and the photos on the walls.

"There are all these different avenues within the B&D city, and I'm just on a different avenue," Diana explains. "There's the avenue of people who do it for play, people who do it to get things, like their lawn mowed and their house painted — there's a big barter system that goes on in the B&D world. There are professionals and I've just moved on to the promotional end."

Those who make their living professionally within "the scene" are a privileged few, according to Slave Heather, sysop of the "Bound For Pleasure" BBS. Heather, a submissive whose proclivities find their expression in silk and white leather, likens "the scene" to a pyramid where those at the top make their living from it, "And the majority of us at the base are just the enthusiasts." Heather is a medical professional on the North Shore, and is emblematic of "scene" participants: a dweller in a bedroom community on the outskirts of the city who is extremely guarded about her private life.

Paranoia runs deep among the D&S community, just as it has and still does among the gay community. People are afraid of being revealed or "outed," ridiculed, summarily fired from their jobs, and causing friends and family who have nothing to do with the scene injury from the fallout of moral judgment that comes so easily when one is publicly pilloried as sadist, masochist or that tried and true chestnut pervert. Not even Diana was willing to provide her full name, noting that she has family elsewhere who might be affected by it. People in the scene are known primarily by the handles they use while on the BBS, even when they are off the system.

"People don't even spank their children anymore, much less their lovers," says Jaclyn, a full-time housewife and mother who lives in the metrowest area, "much less admit to spanking the person that they love most in the whole world. When people talk about sex, they talk about vanilla sex — but sometimes it's nice to have rocky road. Some people are afraid of being fired, because they are spending time on a B&D BBS at work. Have you ever heard of the Quaker practice called "shunning." Well, every one

(for "rehi"). New England's Most Regal Mistress, (as her own registry proclaims) Diana, the FR Sysop, maintains a well-stocked downloadable file library with erotica of all flavors, from the most "vanilla" to the rockingest of rocky roads. Newcomers can browse the system for 15 minutes at a clip for free, with $79 a year for unlimited access or $35 a quarter. For those who have been running up enormous phone bills, charged by the minute on the 1-550 sex lines, Fantasy Realization is the answer.

Bound For Pleasure (374-9255) according to its Sysop, Slave Heather, "was started to give another side, another view of the scene — a softer approach to it." Heather, with her partner and co-sysop, Blackhawk, has been running Executive Connection (621-6090), a non-sexual adult chat BBBs for seven years. "Users wanted another D&S and related fetish board, but they just didn't have the money, the time or the experience." So, together with partners Sir Laurence and Lady Tanya, BFP was started just a few months ago. In addition to offering some of the same features as FR, BFP has a telegram function (sort of a global shorthand marriage of a system page and e-mail) and "action words," where a keyword such as "comfort" put before a username reads out as "Username is offering Username his comfort and sympathy." And it doesn't take much imagination to apply this to erotic purposes. Rates are $25 for 3 mos., $45 for 6 mos., and 65 per year, and can also be paid on-line via credit card (as in the case of the Fantasy Realization BBS). As BFP is new, it is currently offering a generous period of free browsing time for new users.

Fantasy Realization and Bound For Pleasure both require verification through signed, downloadable applications for prospective members.

On the other hand, Argus (674-2345), a free BBS with even more pursuitable lines (65, as opposed to FR and BFP's respective 12 and 14) does not. Simply fax or mail proof of name, address and age for adult access, and you're in. Argus is populated with a lot teenage hackers and would-be cyberpunks, but the adult Jungle SIG or section is large.

Teleconference may be slow — most members preferring to branch off into their own channels, but the file library of erotic material and GIFS (graphic information files) is generous. Argus is an excellent way to cut your teeth in the realm of Cybersex and BBSing in general. From the privacy of your own home (or office, for that matter), safe, anonymous sex has never been this much fun or, for that matter, addictive.

wants to be liked, and nobody wants to be shunned."

Jaclyn, whose name in fact is a handle for a handle, related a story where she was logged on to a BBS for three weeks and a man with a handle she recognized while on line showed up on a her doorstep. "He was dressed as policeman, and I of course did not let him in. There are programs that can allow you to log in and access someone's password, and from there, all the account information: address, telephone number, so you should change your password every week. All the boards have forums or SIGS (special interest groups) outlining safety precautions. There are those for whom risk is essential, but they won't be in the "scene" very long. They will leave by attrition."

A dominant, Jaclyn is in an open marriage where her husband is well-aware that she is seeing a submissive lover. "I'm not worried about my marriage. I don't openly announce to my husband that I had such and such a time with my lover, and how wonderful my lover is.

My husband has the availability of information if he asks. There are very few things I wont tell him. And the only things I won't tell him are because my lover has specifically asked me not to."

As far as her pre-teen son knowing, Jaclyn says, "I don't think that he knows, and I'd rather have him go into sex in the "normal" way — to find his own way. I don't think one's sexual orientation should be affected by one's parents."

Jaclyn's situation is not uncommon to "the scene," and underscores an interesting point: that far from "the scene's" being based in the city and radiating out toward the suburbs, the reverse is true. And there are just as many, if not more, closed "faithful" marriages where husband and wife are dominant and submissive, where they either switch roles, or where one has absolute supremacy over the other. As the Combat Zone dwindles down to its last few shops and clubs, snuffed out by the moralism of the tourist industry, B&D practitioners and "scene" acolytes in the outlying communities are on the increase. Slave Heather's comment is well on point: "For every hundred people who go to Fantasy Night, there are a thousand who are afraid to — but want to."

The question "why" occurs almost as much as "where" concerning "the scene." To some, it is a psychological problem the way homosexuality is sometimes viewed as an obsessive compulsive disorder, to others it is an all-consuming life-style and emerging "third sexuality." Either way, S&M and related practices have been with us for thousands of years, outlined in the writings of Suetonius chronicling such voluptuary classical tyrants as Tiberius, Caligula and Nero through TV mini-series like

by Leslie Ross

The Boston cross-dressing/Bondage & Domination scene is growing all the time. According to Mistress Diana and Lady Bianca, who together host the bi-monthly Fantasy Night at Club Man-Ray, the crowds (usually comprised of 500 or more decked-out dancers) always contain new faces .

"It's a safe place to explore your fetish," says Lady Bianca, stressing at the same time that it is not a wild orgy scene. "You wouldn't believe the stories that get back to me," she laughs. "It's unreal what people want to believe about the scene."

"The scene" is, in fact, hard to generalize. While cross-dressing and B&D are visible parts, the possibilities are endless for trans-gender exploration, and not all of it is sexual.

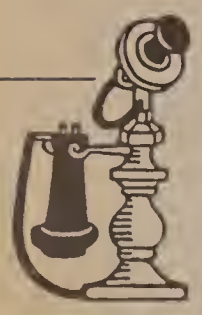
"Most TVs (transvestites) are heterosexual men who enjoy dressing up for a thrill," says "Jennifer" English, a 6-foot plus male who, in five-inch spikes, is hard to miss. "I used to dress up for an erotic rush, but it's more than that now. I just feel comfortable in my feminine person. It's something I've finally come to grips with."

Jennifer's philosophy of cross-dressing has its roots in contemporary popular psychology. "I believe that people have both a male and a female personality," she explains. "To define the balance between them is the ultimate in self-discovery."

It was about a year ago that Jennifer came out as a transvestite. (It's important to differentiate between transvestites [TVs], who enjoy cross-dressing, and transsexuals [TS], who identify with BEING the opposite sex.) Jennifer enjoys the male side of her personality, too, working and living as a man with a heterosexual, monogamous relationship. But a few nights a week, Jennifer puts on her dominatrix outfit and goes out.

"Dominatrix outfit?" you say? Yes. And this is where "the scene" begins to become difficult to generalize. The man who is also Jennifer doesn't identify with being either dominant or submissive. As a woman, though, the dominant side of him emerges, expressing itself in a black bustier and thigh-high boots .

Not all TVs are dominatrixes, and not all dominatrixes are TVs. Comprised of individuals, "the scene" is as difficult to generalize as individuals, each exploring possibilities of self-expression, unhindered by genitalia-based societal dictates.



The Man-Ray Nights, like the up-coming one on February 5, are events where everyone is welcome. (The only rule is you don't hassle anyone else.) Any night of the week, however, cross-dressers gather at Jacques, a downtown bar. Another popular place to meet and hang out are the frequent "Night Life" parties hosted by Tongue. Much smaller than the Man-Ray events, Tongue's evenings are usually comprised of 20 or 30 people who were invited by word of mouth or heard about it through one of the local B&D BBS's (see this issue's article on cyber-sex for more on BBS's).

Tea Bag - v. (inf.) to tea bag; rhythmic insertion and withdrawal of the scrotum from the supine partner's mouth.

Toys - n. - Acoutrements of the scene, eg. dildoes, dressage whips, riding crops, nipple clamps, etc..

Technical Virgin - n. - one who has not engaged in intercourse for the past six months.

Undinism - n. - Moisture fetishism. Includes water sports, golden showers (GS), enemas.

1-900 Sex Call

A Conversation with One of Boston's Phone Sex Madames

Who calls 1-900-Sex Lines? Who runs the lines and what are the people you speak with really like? We spoke with an owner and operator of a 1-800 "Call-Back Fantasy Sex Line" and discovered the reasons for involvement for some of the people behind — and in the middle of — the scene. Tina owns such a service and what follows is an enlightening lesson on the ins and outs of phone sex.

Improper Bostonian.: Tell me about your company

Ms. Phone Sex: It's a 1-800 call back, and everything is charged. Our clients could send a money order with a note of their number and name so when we call and ask for 'Mr. or Ms. Something,' we'll know it's the same people who called us.

I.B.: So they'll send payment to you in advance?

SEX: Yeah, it kind of ruins the spontaneity, but a lot of people send in enough for a few calls, and that way they know it's there, but it's not as common as charging. It's a lot safer to obviously send a bank check, because the banks can protect your identity.

I.B.: How did you become involved in the business?

SEX: Well, it's kind of an evolution thing. I had gone across country and when I came back, I didn't have a job, and a girlfriend of mine was working as a dispatcher and doing calls for one of the companies in Boston. She asked if I wanted to try it, and that's how I got involved. I was doing calls for other companies too.

I.B.: How did they hire you when you first started?

SEX: They just said, 'O.K., you're hired'

I.B.: You're hired?

SEX: Yeah. But, the way I do it is based on personality, because there are so many people who call up who don't even know their own name. I think that when someone has intelligence and a sense of humor and open attitude, they're fine. A lot of places won't hire people unless they're experienced. Some of the girls I ask say, 'Well, I have a girlfriend who does it,' though guys tend to say, 'Oh, yeah, I'm experienced.'

I.B.: Is it mainly women who work for you?

SEX: No, I have a lot of men working for me. Men will call up thinking that they're going to be getting free phone sex with women and there are so few straight women who call for straight men. I just got a call the other day, and I couldn't believe it was a straight woman. I said, 'You want to talk to a man?'[Laughter] So when I tell the guys, 'You will be speaking to men' they say, 'Oh no, I couldn't do that.'

I.B.: Is it hard to get into the role?

SEX: No, because it's work.

I.B.: How do you look at what you do? Do you ever start laughing?

SEX: I have had a smile on my face but have never actually burst out laughing, although a lot of the girls have said 'Thank God for a mute button.' There are some really weird fantasies that these guys have.

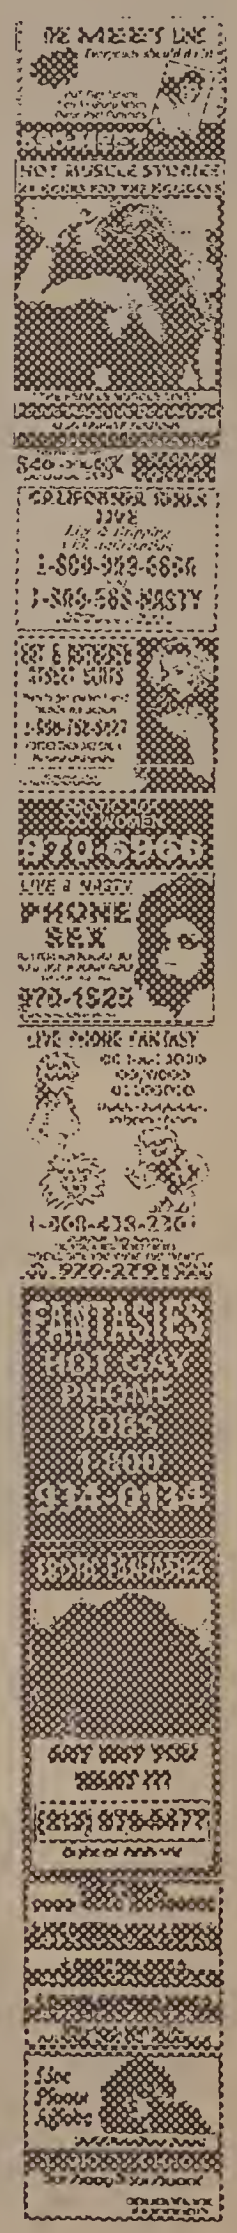
I.B.: Like?

SEX: I had to do a call to this guy in New York the other night, and this guy . . . he wanted a woman who had 12 hands, to do what he wanted them to do. He actually thinks that you're doing these things. He literally thinks that you are performing the acts that she's telling you to do and I said 'Listen, if I try to do these things that you're asking me to do, I'm going to fall on my face.' He said, 'Then fall on it' . . . Hello? If it wasn't four in the morning, I would have gotten a real good chuckle out of it.

I.B.: How do you get mentally prepared for these calls at that time of night?

SEX: I only do calls when I'm the only one around. Motivation, to me, is that it's my job. But I think a lot of these women really feel these men like them. You know, like 'Oh, he said he was going to call back. Has so and so called?' So, a lot of the women really take it to heart. A lot of them feel that there is an emotional tie there. I think there's a difference between using it as a business from your home, or using it as a crutch if you have nothing else in your life. These men really supply your ego, and at the same time, your pocketbook. I feel that I don't want them liking me. You know, a lot of people call over and over and over.

I.B.: So do you get repeat customers?



SEX: Oh yeah, half of the people who have called so far are regular customers.

I.B.: Do you have any kind of package deals?

SEX: Yeah, if they call between 3 and 8 a.m., it's $2 off. I'm cheaper than any one else in Massachusetts. It's $24.95 unlimited but you really have to try to get them 'off.'

I.B.: How did you hire people?

SEX: I put ads in papers in almost every state. I already had my phones installed with an answering machine, and every day for weeks that machine was filled. Some of it was people calling up and goofing, and some of it was sincere.

Favorite Son, with its infamous Linda Kozlowski bondage bedroom scene and Madonna's current Body of Evidence. (Oedipus refers to Madonna as the PG of B&D.)

An issue that goes some way toward explaining this is the so-called "behavioral sink," a term coined by Tom Wolfe in his Tangerine Metal Flake Streamlined Baby for modern overcrowding.

Psychologist John Calhoun observed that when rats are overcrowded, the dominant 5% become the "criminal" or aberrant 5%. Abraham Maslow, who did pioneering research on dominance in the 30s, and conducted surveys long before Kinsey, Masters and Johnson noted that sex among lower primates (monkeys at the Bronx zoo), which was almost constant in captivity, was a form of dominance behavior where the more dominant animals mounted the less dominant.

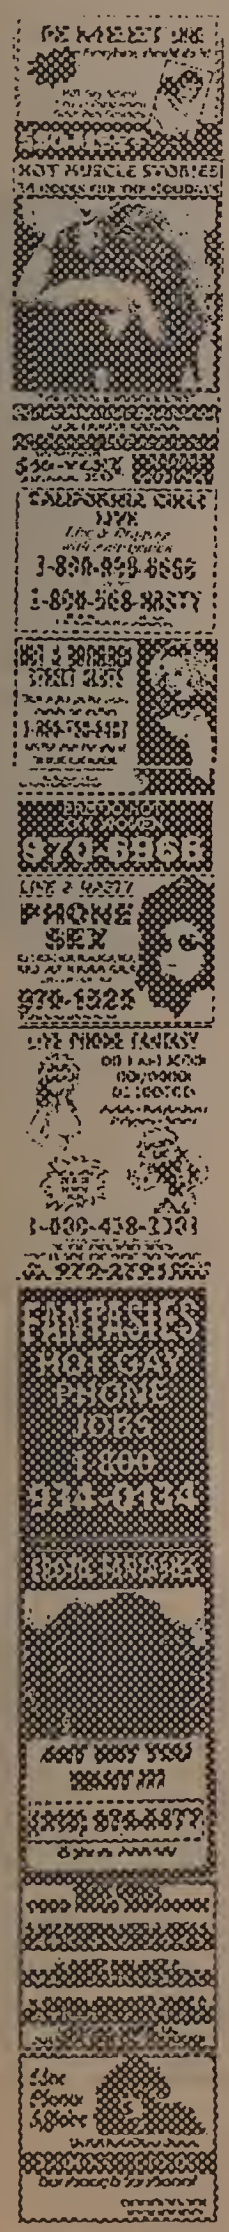
In 1936, Maslow interviewed female college students — he felt that male answers were tainted and distorted by concerns of self-esteem) and put forth in a paper that female sexuality was related to dominance. According to Maslow, higher dominance women experimented sexually, medium dominance women had romantic ideals attached to sex, and low dominance women tended to view sex as strictly for child-bearing. (Maslow cited one high-dominance woman who could self-induce orgasm merely by looking at a man.) With a man, a high-dominance woman could be either yielding, or overbearing. In any event, it is worth noting that dominant sex as social behavior seems to historically coincide with the advent of cities. And zoologist Desmond Morris likened the cities, and by extension the suburbs that surround them, to a "human zoo."

Apropos of this, the current "scene" abounds with a remnant sense of the sexual revolution of the sixties and seventies, where liaisons are often referred to as "play," conjuring up Norman O. Brown's "polymorphous perverse" and Herbert Marcuse's asserted civilized need for "desublimation." But this play is venturesome and not without risk, which is why mistress/master and slave find it almost essential to arrive at a contract defining the parameters of their relationship, their mutual expectations, even down what safeword or gesture will be used to call a session off should things seem to go too far.

In his book Unnatural Death, former Chief Medical Examiner for the City of New York Michael M. Baden noted a case where heavy playing led to a death that he signed out as "asphyxia during sexual bondage." When asked by the police why she had left the room as the submissive doctor was choking on a gag placed too far back in the throat, the dominant nurse in that case responded honestly, "because he looked like he was having such a good time."

"If you look on the bulletin board there's a B&D safety manual we got from a lesbian publication," Diana responded. "It's things that you've got to watch out for. I've had young men in their thirties start to hyperventilate because it's such an overload. They've dreamt about being tied up, dreamt about being at the foot of a mistress, dreamt about getting spanked, fantasized about it for years — and now it's a reality. They start going into overload, that's the only thing you could call it. I always really push safety — take your time.

"I see it on the board," Diana adds, "people saying, 'can we get together tonight, can we get together tonight? I want to tie you up!' You don't even know this person! The first thing I say, if you're going to meet someone off the board is meet in a restaurant or coffee shop. Talk for a while, get to know the person. Don't go anywhere with them the first time you meet. This, coming from me who used to call people up not even knowing anything about them and saying "Hi can you come pick me up?' I was lucky — I could be in Arabia right now being some little harem girl. I could have been kidnapped and sold. It happens you know.



"When I was dealing with this probably ten years ago," she concludes, "I was wondering, 'What am I doing? B&D? People are going to think I'm weird!' Well, Mistress Antoinette had a quote in her magazine "Reflections," and it was the greatest quote I've ever heard in my life: 'What you think of me is none of my business.' If you think I'm crazy or a weirdo, or whatever, It's none of my business. It's your business. That really changed it within me. I said: "That's right — it's nobody's business but my own."

Vanilla - n. adj. - straight heterosexual activity, up to and including light recreational bondage.

Voyeurism - n. - sexual arousal from viewing the bodies or sexual activities of others.

Zoophilia - n. - sexual intercourse with animals.

And finally, as if you weren't "sated" already, some ever-popular slangs for sexual intercourse:

I.B.: When you hire someone, do you meet them face to face?

SEX: No, because first of all, some of them are halfway across the country. No, I didn't meet anybody. I got the information from what I sent out, which was kind of like a questionnaire and the bottom part was asking 'what exactly would you be willing to do over the phone?' — which doesn't exactly mean 'what do you do in reality,' because what I do over the phone definitely does not reflect what I would ever do in reality. When I was talking to that person, I knew right away whether or not I was going to consider him or her anyway, from their voice and attitude; I don't like liars or people who are condescending. I don't want anyone in my office that I don't like, or anyone working for me that I don't like. It's not worth the aggravation.

I.B.: Do you have people in your office?

SEX: Yes, they dispatch phone calls, but no person who works in my office does phone calls. That's not a pre-requisite. I am the only one who 'does calls.' I work ovemight, so I do the calls. There's nobody around.

I.B.: So do most of your operators work out of their homes?

SEX: Every single person. Nobody comes in and does calls. If there was something special, or a client likes something in particular, we'll tell them.

I.B.: What's the most bizarre request you've had?

SEX: I like the 'big breasted woman who smokes a cigar' request, but there are a lot of men who have a fetish for women who smoke cigarettes. I don't know why, whether it's a Brenda Vaccaro voice or what. I don't know what that whole deal is. Maybe it's a phallic thing with having a cigarette in the mouth. I would say that if I were to take out my records and figure it out, I'd say that most men have a fantasy to be submissive. That's not to say that they are submissive. That's what they get into on the phone. Men are submissive. They want very dominant women. And when they want submissive women, they want really submissive women. We're not talking 'Yes sir, no sir.' We're talking submissive.

I.B.: Do you think that some of the role playing that goes on during these conversations can be dangerous and encourage deviant behavior?

SEX: Like a little girl?

I.B.: Yes. Do you think it's dangerous to have a guy call up and request those fantasies?

SEX: I've gone through that a million times in my head. For a lot of guys, there's a fantasy with little girls. Even though they know that the person has to be 18 legally, you have to pretend that you're 12 — or God forbid younger — and you think, 'Am I satisfying his urge by playing a little girl or creating a strong urge to see if it's really as good as it is on the phone,' but I don't think that would be the case. At that moment, that's what I would want to do. I don't think a rapist would call up and rape someone on the phone and say 'I want to do this in reality,' but I've thought of that. I had this guy a long time ago and his fantasy was five year-old girls. It was sick. It was sick! A the end of the conversation, he was like Doctor Jeckyl and Mr. Hyde. He would say 'Do you think I am crazy?' and I'd say, 'No, I don't think you're crazy,' and he'd ask, 'Do you approve?' and I'd say, 'Of course I don't approve. Do you approve of what you're doing?' and he'd say, 'I don't approve but it's my fantasy. And that's why I'm calling you. Are you going to call the police?' I said, 'No, I'm not going to call the police, but if I heard that two little five year-old girls in your hometown had been raped, then I'd call the police.' He knew I'd meant it. I don't think there's ever been a connection between living out a fantasy and acting one out.

I.B.: I think that if I had a fantasy for five year old girls and I called you, I'd probably work it out. But what about people who have called, and then at a future point may have gotten the 'urge' upon seeing a five year-old girl but can't make it to a phone?

SEX: I think the reason these people call up is because they don't want to act it out. I don't think that they would. I don't think that we've ever had any repercussions, but one of the things that I thought of is someone, maybe an older man or someone in ill health not making it through a phone call and having a heart attack. One of the guys I talk to said, 'This is like aerobics for the heart and the doctor told me it was good.' I said, 'But we've all heard of men dying after sex,' and he said, 'This is different. I'm not with someone.' But once he hung up in the middle of a call, and when I tried him back, the line was busy. He's 70 and I was worried. But he called back later and said that he was sorry he hung up. It was just U.P.S. at his door and he had to hang up real quick. People do hang up. A lot of them hang up immediately after they accomplish what they had called for.

I.B.: Do you see yourself doing this for a while?

SEX: Yeah. Even though I've never really had a problem getting a job. I worked one for 10 years in one situation.

I.B.: Were there a lot of costs involved in starting your own fantasy line?

SEX: Yes. Every single person in my life knows what I do. That's where the money is. I received part of my inheritance early, so my mother could see me do allright. I received it to start a life.

I.B.: Would you ever again work for somebody else now that you're your own boss?

SEX: I don't think anyone would have me. I left somewhere else, but long before I started planning this. I left the service where I was doing calls way before I opened up and did all of my own leg work. This man at one service in Boston has asked me to call him so I don't think there are any bad feelings.

I.B.: Do you ever do splits, in which I mean a situation where someone may call you with a specific fetish or fantasy and you'll refer them to an operator of another service?

SEX: No, but I did have this one woman call me who was referred by that nice guy I told you about.

I.B.: Do you have any limits to your operators for something like bondage?

SEX: I just call them homeworkers. You're not doing anything, although I think some of the women do some things, but most of them just sit at home. But there are a lot of them who 'get off' at home. I've had transsexuals or transvestites — they've all worked for me. I mean I've had props when they [men] tell me to slap my ass, I had leather slippers and I'd just slap them together. I don't care how realistic it sounds, I'm not slapping my butt.

TOUT LES MATINS DU MONDE

"A Sweet Lesson On Loss"

Alain Corneau's film is a somber, beautiful meditation on the nature of art versus commerce. The main character is Sainte Colombe (Jean-Pierre Marielle), a reclusive musician who lives the simple life in the French countryside, where he resists repeated offers to play in the court of King Louis XIV. His young protégé, the flashy, technically-accomplished Marin Marias (Guillame Depardieu, son of Gerard, who plays Marias as an older man), lacks his master's philosophy and joins the royal court. But he returns years later — bloated, bewigged, face heavily rouged — and wonders if it is not too late for him to become the musician he could have. A sense of loss pervades this sad and moving film, with special emphasis on the loss of those opportunities which we recognize only once they have passed us by. A.L.

LORENZO'S OIL

"A Brave and Daring Brew"

Based on the lives of Augusto and Michaela Odone, Lorenzo's Oil is the story of a couple's efforts to save the life of their son from adrenoleukodystrophy (ALD). In this gritty, painful and brilliant picture, the parents (Nick Nolte and Susan Sarandon) not only push the medical establishment for answers, but take up ALD research on their own. while keeping their marriage and their son alive. This triumphant film, which features a truly outstanding performance by Ms. Sarandon, addresses its medical issues and "docu-drama" format with a high level of craft. Nolte's Italian accent is annoying for a while, but it is the only false note in an otherwise important film about the power of determination in the face of helplessness. B.C.

CHAPLIN

"Portrait of a Genius"

Richard Attenborough's Chaplin is daring in its scope, attempting to follow Chaplin's life from his Dickensian childhood and training in British vaudeville through his meteoric film career, ending with the famous comedien's final years. While Robert Downey, Jr. is up to the task, not just imitating Chaplin but emulating the Little Tramp and the young mogul, the film bites off a bit more than it can handle. At more than two hours, the film could have ended with Chaplin's deportation: what follows is fodder, bordering on the sentimental. Still, Kevin Kline hands in a good performance as Douglas Fairbanks, and the supporting cast of Charlie's family and friends is tapped from a fine well of talent. More might have been made of Chaplin's creative genius and innovation, but the movie remains entertaining and uplifting. T.S.L.

A FEW GOOD MEN

"Exciting, Moving, and Funny"

Rob Reiner hits on a fail-safe formula for his latest picture: big stars In a politically-relevant drama, climaxing in riveting courtroom exchanges in A Few Good Men, a film in whlch two Marines are on trial for murdering one of their own. Lawyers Tom Cruise and Demi Moore try to prove the death was accidental as a result of secret disciplinary orders from above. Tom Cruise reprises his usual hot shot character role wlth élan, while Demi Moore hands In a respectable and dignified performance as an internal affalrs officer. Jack Nicholson, while convincing as a hard-nosed colonel, tends to lapse Into Nicholson-ese, playing the sly, smart-mouthed speechmaker. A Few Good Men contains decent comedy as well as moving actlon, and winning lines are equally distributed. T.S.L.

MATINEE

A B-Movie That Earns a B-Plus

Cathy Moriarty stars as Ruth, the leading lady in the movie within a moive "Mant" featured in Universal Pictures "Matineee"

BY TIM LEMIRE

The scene is Key West, 1962, and the latest B-movie thriller from "Shock Expert" Lawrence Woosley is coming to town: "MANT!: Half man! Half Ant! All Terror!" Woosley himself (John Goodman) will attend the premiere, and as he says, the timing is perfect: the Cuban Missile Crisis has just begun, and in Key West, 90 miles away from Castro, the tension is running high; people are primed to be scared to death.

Matinee, a paean to B-movie disasters, tends to overreach itself by trying to fit in romance, drama, and comedy in one nostalgic package, but for entertainment value and laughs, the movie earns a strong B plus. MANT!, the story of a man who mutates into an ant after radiation exposure, harkens to flicks like Them! and The Amazing Colossal Man, which today enjoy cult classic status. As the faux Hitchcock horror director Woosley, John Goodman is perfectly cast, carrying the movie along with avuncular charm and presence.

"It's getting harder to scare people these days," says Woosley. "Too much competition." Indeed, the Cuban Missile Crisis outside the theater mirrors the melodrama inside: fear of nuclear holocaust and its radioactive aftermath, adults panicking in the supermarket, bizarre stories abounding, as when the young girl Sandra tells her classmates (all in duck and cover position) that if the bomb fell and they survived, they'd be puking up their organs. "Eww," says one girl.

The movie's protagonist, Gene, is played by Simon Fenton (The Power of One), who resembles a young Doogie Howser. His father is on one of the blockade ships, and as a Navy brat, he makes few friends as he moves from town to town. His only friends are horror characters, and so Woosley befriends him. The climax of the MANT! premiere coincides with the zenith of Cuban Missile Crisis paranoia, with results that are comedic and dramatic.

Director Joe Dante recreates 1962 in excruciating detail, and while verisimilitude is achieved, the props oftentimes seem forced, as when a woman gestures with a copy of Doctor Sax by Jack Kerouac. Dante makes sure to include Davy Crockett, Art Linkletter, authentic movie posters from Day of the Triffids, etc., and any other period prop he can lay his hands on. It makes a convincing picture, but it looks paint-by-the numbers.

Writer Charlie Haas (Gremlins) provides us with a fair enough script, replete with irony (in nutrition class, kids are encouraged to eat three servings of red meat a day), some romance, sentiment, and of course humor. It's all a bit much for under two hours, and the exaggeration factor might have been higher, but the "B" grade passes muster.

The jokes work best coming from Goodman, whose character in Woosley is an affable shyster. When Goodman spies a stuffed lizard on a shelf, he immediately brainstorms for his next B movie: Mani-gator! Ali-man! She-gator! Gal-i-gator! Goodman is never disappointing, and regrettably Haas takes too long to secure him mainstage where he can enjoy him.

The remaining members of the cast, in terms of characterization and performance, are on the level of The Wonder Years: Lisa Jakub plays Sandra, a pre-pubescent Joan Baez, who upon receiving a week of detention, comments, "They put Ghandi away for a year." Kellie Martin is Sherry, the pouffy teen kitten; and Omri Katz is Stan, a cocky advisor to Gene. None of the adults are especially believable, except for Goodman. As if to reinforce this point, Goodman advises Gene, "Adults are no different from kids, son, they're making things up as they go along, just like you."

Matinee does better in the with the easier task of recreating bad B-movie humor than recreating the real horror of the Cuban Missile Crisis. As everything wraps up nicely at the end, moviegoers are left to mull on their own how the ending in real life isn't happy: the crisis isn't over, but it has initiated the '60s, with assassinations, Vietnam, and nightmares on TV instead of in the theater. ❑

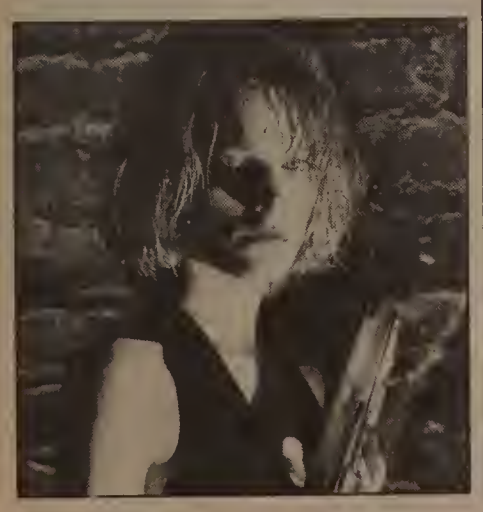
EIGHT IS NO LONGER ENOUGH

An Interview with Betty Buckley

BY TONY LEIBS

Singer/actress Betty Buckley was recently in town to promote Rain Without Thunder, a new independent film which opens in Boston on February 12. We met at Dakota's restaurant during a press luncheon, where she talked at length about her varied career.

For those of us who know Betty Buckley mainly as Abbey Bradford, the incredibly nice mom on the television show Eight Is Enough (and dimly remember her as the sympathetic gym teacher in Carrie), a little background is in order. For starters, Buckley sees herself more as a stage actress and singer than a television or movie star. She won a Tony award for Cats, has appeared in numerous Broadway plays and was twice nominated for an Emmy. She currently lives in New York, where she sings in small clubs such as the Bottom Line and the Russian Tea Room. She has a new album due out in March, which is a collection of Broadway standards and obscurities, recorded with a small jazz ensemble. Rain Without Thunder is her first theatrical film in quite some time.



Since the film has such a pro-life message, she was asked if she was worried that Rain Without Thunder might be seen as being too anti-abortion. On the contrary, she feared while shooting the film that it might be seen as "too soft." "No need to worry about that," she was told. Ms. Buckley seemed to believe, apparently more than anyone else in the room, that the film is even-handed and designed to engender debate, and not to propagandize the abortion issue. "It's about being vigilant about human rights, regardless of your own views on abortion," she said. Though that may be the position assumed by the context of the film, Buckley was kind enough to share her own views as well. She's pro-choice, but quick to point out that pro-choice is "an important distinction from pro-abortion." She is not even sure which side writer/director Gary Bennett falls on, saying he "likes to stir things up," rather than shove his own opinions in the audience's face.

Betty Buckley stars in "Rain Without Thunder" opening in Boston on February 12

Buckley describes herself as "apolitical, but feminist in nature," and was attracted to this project not because of the message, but because of what she considers to be a good script. "I'm just your basic working-class actress," she says modestly. She is currently looking at more independent scripts, but says, with a disarming laugh, "My basic desire is to hang out and drink cappuccino with my friends." It's hard to take issue with anyone whose personal ambitions so closely match one's own. ❑

ALIVE

"A Survivor's Tale of Strength and Spirit"

When a plane carrying a South American rugby team crashes in the Andes mountains en route to Chile, the surviving team of athletes find themselves marooned with little food, shelter or method of communicating with the outside world. Based on a true story, Alive is as much a tale of spiritual discovery as of physical endurance. The men who comprise the bulk of the cast are mostly new faces, with the exception of Ethan Hawke (Dead Poets Society) and Vincent Spano (Rumble Fish). Alive is a moving film — a story of strength and even humor. We follow the survivors daily struggles, and though the cannibalism scenes are not for the squeamish, Alive is a reminder of the fragility of our life on earth. T.S.L.

BODY OF EVIDENCE

"Sex and Fury Signifying Nothing"

Central to any lawyer's case is motive; yet, this simple fact has somehow escaped the creators of Body of Evidence. This latest, Basic Instinct-like sex thriller involves a lawyer named Frank Dulaney (Willem DaFoe) who is defending one Rebecca Carlson (Madonna), a woman accused of killing her rich lover with sex (he had a bad heart) after having worked her way into his will. DaFoe's performance is tepid at best; he gives us no idea who his character is, how he feels about his wife (Anne Archer) or how he feels about himself. As for Madonna, her performance is as one note as her monotone rap in "Vogue." When the film fails to deliver on any wavelength, we end up feeling like the victim of a tease — and in this case, it's a sexual tease of the worst kind. T.S.L.

NOWHERE TO RUN

"Damme Good"

This rewrite of Shane is, indeed, the best Van Damme yet, but that's still no recommendation. There is one insurmountable problem: Jean Claude himself. He's the opposite of magnetic; he's more like a black hole at the center of the film, into which every last particle of credibility disappears. Other parts of the movie work: the stunts and fights are well-choreographed, and there are a couple of major-league heavies, Joss Ackland from Lethal Weapon 2 and Ted Levine from The Silence of the Lambs, who add a good sense of menace. Levine is an especially impressive bad guy, possessing in abundance a quality that Van Damme will never develop as fully as his muscles: true screen presence.

PETER'S FRIENDS

"With Friends Like These"

Kenneth Brannagh's latest, about the tenth-year reunion of a disparate group of college friends in England, is an absolute stiff. The reason: Rita Rudner's glib and shallow screenplay, which she co-wrote with her husband, Martin Bregman. Lineslike "If there is a God, he takes awfully long lunch breaks," bear the indelible stamp of Rudner's crummy one-liner sensibility. Worse yet, this film also marks her acting debut, making it a one-two combination that floors Brannagh early and often. His acting is fine, but his direction seems mired in the script's banality. The one bright spot is Emma Thompson, Branagh's wife, who looks radiant, and displays a genuine flair for comedy. A. L.

SCENT OF A WOMAN

"Pacino Reeks of Hoffman"

A blind, grouchy, former military officer (Pacino) takes his new prep school "babysitter" (Chris O'Donnell) on a Thanksgiving weekend extravaganza in New York City. While the youth frets for Pacino's safety (and about his own problems at school), Pacino overtips waiters, dances the Tango and correctly identifies the perfume (not to mention the hair and eye color) of every woman he meets. He carries the film, but his performance has a "let me show you that I can do it the way Dustin Hoffman would do it" quality which is too self-conscious. If you want a dose of Pacino, see Glengarry Glen Ross. B.C.

Yankel Ginzburg Brings Russia To Boston

Artist Yankel Ginzburg is world renowned for his masterful use of acrylic elements.

BY TOBIN STREETT

Born in the former Soviet Union and given an alias to escape the anti-Semitic plague that at the time blanketed his homeland, artist Yankel Ginzburg is today considered to be one of the most respected and innovative artists on the planet. After immigrating to Israel with his family at the age of 12, Ginzburg pursued one of his favorite pastimes — writing. It was due to his passion for writing that he first encountered an elder's encouragement to study art. One of Yankel's editors noticed an illustration drawn by him when he was a teenage writer for a Tel Aviv newspaper. He had been asked to draw an illustration to accompany one of his articles when his editor, and Yankel himself discovered where his true talents lay.

"I did not really think about the art too much back then."

Today, he is forced to think about his art, particularly his acrylic sculpture designs. Though Ginzburg has worked with many mediums which include oils, acrylics, tapestries, silkscreens and lithographs, his most recent passion is directed toward acrylic sculpture.

"It's work and it is often frustrating" says Ginzburg from his Washington D.C. residence. He appears, at least over the phone, to be hesitant in describing the process of developing his magnificently colored creations. As if deep in the middle of the design process, Ginzburg described the tasks involved in heating and bending the acrylic elements as a long undertaking which, if mistakes are made in the bending or heating process, becomes quite an expensive one. Representative of Ginzburg's commitment to working with such an expensive medium, are his high-priced finished products. Ranging in the low thousands for some of his silkscreens and boards to figures as high as $40 thousand, Ginzburg's art is nothing short of hot, hot, hot! In fact, his work is in such demand that he was commissioned to design a clock encased in acrylic which it currently resides down the road from Yankel — in the White House.

"Today's art market has seen drastic changes, making it in many ways more difficult than ever. We decided to take a fresh look, making an artistic and economic decision to go in an entirely new direction."

That direction is named Yankel Ginzburg and his art is not to be missed.❑

Nothing But Toe Tapping, Crowd Pleasing Musical Entertainment

Sandy Martin stars as the legendary country western singer in "A Closer Walk with Patsy Cline" at the Charles Playhouse through February 14

BY NANCY LEONARD

Though it's awfully shy on theatricality, A Closer Walk with Patsy Cline is downright pleasing musical entertainment. This vibrant, toe-tapping revue could be the show the Charles Playhouse has been waiting for to fill its seats after the long-running Nunsense closed last year.

Billed as a musical concert retrospective, Dean Regan's script imagines a deejay at WKLM in Winchester, Virginia, paying tribute to a local girl, born Virginia Hensley in 1932. From her start in his studio 15 years ago, she grew into one of country music's great stars, Patsy Cline. The broadcast takes place on March 5, 1963 - the night her plane crashed in a snow storm outside Nashville, ending her short career, and creating a legend in the musical world.

But the evening is really about music, not biography. The popular Boston-based country singer Sandy Martin impersonates Patsy Cline in concert backed by her own band. With some costume changes, reflecting increasing fortunes, she gives us Cline's famous hits, such as "Walkin' After Midnight," "Crazy," "Just a Closer Walk with Thee," "Sweet Dreams," and "I Fall to Pieces."

Whether or not Martin resembles the original singer will be for fans to determine. She brings little sense of particular personality, and virtually no commentary, to the role. Yet, there's real appeal in her numbers. Her voice is strong, colorful, and confidant, with rich interpretive artistry and a practiced country sound. Twangy highs and sultry lows - and near yodeling at one point - enliven the proceedings even more. The best song of the night is Hank Williams' "Your Cheatin' Heart." Apart from the hits, she does wonders with Gogi Grant's "The Wayward Wind" and "Blue Moon of Kentucky," an Elvis Presley recording.

The evening is filled with the infectious country, soul, rock, and gospel sounds Cline brought to mainstream recording. Unfortunately, Regan's script keeps interrupting the music every two or three songs with extraneous and lesser material. As "The Silver Streak," who spins the records, Larry Blamire's accompanying recollections provide virtually no more information than appears in the short program note. His on-air tribute is also saddled with commercial jingles and a news reading, self-consciously designed to evoke the era.

Most detrimental, though, are the stand-up comedy routines he performs in each act. These do not pass so quickly. In the guise of a hayseed clown or a hungover Vegas comic, he trots out old vaudeville jokes and audience participation schemes. The dated diversions only rob the evening of its focus and vitality. If one thought the blue-green initials "P.C.," scripted on the rear curtain, could not possibly stand for political correctness in the country atmosphere, these tacky interruptions certainly reinforce that view.

The five-piece band - Patsy's "Rhythmaires" led by Randy Hughes, who also went down in that plane crash - gives the evening a big, polished sound.

Bob Gifford designed the elaborate, multi-colored proscenium arch, beneath which they play; it's more fitting for the later Las Vegas and Carnegie Hall settings than the early engagements. Steven Rosen's lighting adds to the mood of advancing fame. Troy Siegfreid's costumes include a snazzy red and white satin cowgirl outfit, and some urban dress-up attire.

You don't have to be a Patsy Cline fan to enjoy this show - but maybe a simple retrospective of 20 or so songs wasn't considered enough to draw a wider audience. The script, though, could be scrapped without any harm. Just concentrate on the vibrant music and forget the rest. The toe-tapping evening is a real crowd-pleaser when Sandy Martin sings. ❑

Exploring the Power of Flowers

BY CHAD L. SANBORN

When it comes to appreciating flowers, there are two kinds of people; women and men. Nature, with its affinity for chaotic order, delineated the human view of flowers along this clear-cut line. Women adore flowers for their beauty, covet them for their odoriferous pleasure, desire them for the life and passion they represent. Men, however, like flowers simply because they get them out of trouble.

Granted this disparity runs contrary to modern thinking. After centuries of inequality, we've got most people believing the sexes are on par—or at least mulling over the possibility. This is hardly a small accomplishment, given it means swaying people such as my mother, who views such parity as an insult to women—one which drags them down to the same piggish level as men.

But flowers have been around longer than both modern thinking and my mother. I think it was Socrates who said, "Nature waits for no sociological thesis on bi-gender issues." Then again, maybe it wasn't. But proper attribution isn't the issue here; we're dealing in motivations.

Men, in the stereotypical sense—that is, the only sense in which men are ever examined—so not grasp the minute details that render flowers, these living, breathing, oxygen-producing creatures, so desirable to women. However, men fully grasp the implications of the opposite sex's fondness of daffodils, tiger lilies and, of course, roses. You might even say men have a burly choke hold on the implications.

Stay out a little too late with the boys? That's nothing a half dozen orchids surrounded by green twigs with purple leaves won't fix. Just now remember today is your anniversary? ("I mean really, dear, it only comes once a year so it's kinda easy to forget.") Bring out the heavy artillery. A dozen long-stem red roses ought to keep her from remembering what an insensitive slob you are.

This heathen view of flowers stems from, like everything else nasty in the human character, childhood. As young boys, the males of our species don't spend their idle time smelling flowers. They trample them during miniature re-enactments of the Normandy invasion. Rather than picking flowers to arrange a sweet bouquet, boys tend to accidentally burn them while undergoing the tribal rite of manhood known as "playing with matches." Boys are apt to play "loves me/ loves me not" but find the game more satisfying when played with bug legs.

A general lack of appreciation for flowers reveals itself later in life, much to the chagrin of men. It is not unusual for a man, under pressure to appear interested, to bend over and deeply inhale the nonexistent odors of unscented flowers. After straightening, and with a goofy approximation of a nurturing look firmly entrenched on his face, he says something sensitive like "Hey, these small nice!" Most women simply stand by in quiet awe, watching idiocy in action.

Given this ignorance, men have proven themselves adept at manipulating flowers for their own ends. They had to. The health consciousness of the times have rendered candy obsolete, and the connotations that go along with a gift of tofu and wheat germ are more along the lines of "your butt's too big" rather than "love me do."

Another effective love bribe from years gone by, nylons, is merely a commodity rather than a pay-off in today's economic model of love. A man could leverage the power of jewelry but he runs the risk of the recipient inferring much more than an apology. Besides, if a man coughs up expensive trinkets every time he's in trouble, he will be flat broke in a matter of days.

As it stands, flowers are the only remaining practical legal tender for reconstructing debts of love. But there are rules to giving these love bribes. Break one and a man's true motivation for giving flowers is exposed.

A "happiness" bouquet smells like a rat. Typically, happiness bouquets consist of a bunch of furry sticks served up in a straw basket garnished with tacky plastic drink stirrers and helium-filled balloons. These bouquets are strictly for mothers. Give one to a significant other and everything you've ever done wrong will come trickling back into the foreground of her memory. Besides, they're ugly.

A sing rose is cliché. This one can be used, but rarely. Usually when a woman sniffs a single rose, all she smells is the pungent odor of cheapness. The monobud technique works best as a surprise and should be reserved for laying groundwork when you know you'll be in trouble in the near future. "I'm glad you like it, punk'in. Oh by the way honey, the boys and I have designated Tuesdays as poker night and..."

A dozen red roses is a cliché for a reason. This one is common, but it's also a universal classic because it works. Like say, hotdogs, there is nothing new here, but it satisfies just the same. Unless your crime is something unbearable like philandering with her sister or a politically incorrect positioning of the toilet seat, a dozen red roses work every time. You may have to sleep on the pit group, but a t least you'll be sleeping on the streets.

Variety ensures success. Occasionally sending purple irises or yellow daffodils will make her think you're sensitive and know more about flowers than just the rose cliché. Also, variety lends the act a personal touch. If you can actually make her believe you are thoughtful, you're in. And best of all, irises and daffodils are cheaper than roses.

Never give flowers in person. Having asserted the redemptive powers of flowers, it should be noted there is a brief incubation period before the gift begins to take full affect. There is old saying that hell hath no fury like a woman who recognizes when she is being manipulated. Let some unsuspecting delivery boy risk scurrying away with thorn scratches all over his face. It's his job.

Incidentally, it also should be noted that—on those rare instances when women's actions are misunderstood as transgressions—men like to receive flowers just as much as women do. Sure we do. Really. Why, men like flowers so much we sometimes let them stand in a vase filled with slowly evaporating water until the petals are withered and crunchy.

Occasionally, you'll run up against a seemingly exceptional woman who maintains that, although if, she enjoys flowers, there exists little practicality for them— a classic case of "listen not to what I say but rather what I'm saying." Despite the thought behind the gift, she will decree, the ephemeral nature of cut flowers renders them a waste of good money. She's lying. She's merely testing the measure of your feelings for her, cynically daring you to prove you care so much that you'll cast aside all common sense and spend blindly on useless items. So ignore her by paying attention to her.

These few rules will aid in mending any breach your loutishness may have created. Most of all, simply keep in mind that flowers speak to women in a language men can't comprehend., But then, if men could par lay voo the tongue of tulips, there would be little need for flowers in the first place. ❑

TRATTORIA IL PANINO

A Culinary Cinderella

BY R. E. BRUNSON

By day, Trattoria Il Panino serves Italian subs and sandwiches. A passerby on Parmenter street in the North End would see the small storefront with six tables and conclude that this must be yet another Italian sub shop. However, after nightfall, a transformation occurs, and a line of eager diners forms on the street outside.

In Italy, a trattoria is a place to go for fresh food in an informal setting. Upon entering Il Panino, we felt right at home in the casual atmosphere imparted by the simple wooden tables and chairs, stucco walls and vintage photos of Italy. To get to our table, we were directed past the busy open kitchen down a narrow stairway. This dining area had the added charm of wine racks overhead and a corner area filled with a wide selection of antipasti. Our waiter, a native Italian, wore the simple house uniform of shirt, tie, and a white apron.

Once presented with the menu and wine list, we couldn't help but listen intently to the selection of specials including the option of veal or chicken prepared in any manner wished — picatta, saltimbocca or milanese. We ordered the 1990 Montepulciano D'Abruzzo Castello Dell'Abate ($15.95),a full-bodied red from the extensive list of Italian wines. We also chose two of the antipasti to begin. One was the homemade vegetable antipasto, Casarecci di Vegetali ($9.95), a specialty of the house, and the other was Bresaola ($9.95), an aged beef cured in cognac (both selections were pleasing).

The vegetable antipasto plate had a selection of nine grilled, roasted or marinated vegetables in portions large enough for everyone in our party to have more than just a sample. The antipasti were simply (yet expertly) prepared from the sliced eggplant marinated in marinara sauce to the broccoli rabe in herbal olive oil to the escarole with pine nuts, raisins and capers. There was not a scrap left on the plate. The bresaola was also inspiring in its artful presentation (prepared by our waiter) of paper thin slices of ruby red bresaola arranged around a mound of arugula drizzled with extra virgin olive oil, lemon juice, and freshly ground pepper. The taste was sharper but a little more delicate than prosciutto, and was nicely complimented by the tartness of the arugula and cheese. Garnishes were thin wedges of imported parmigiano reggiano cheese.

After such a strong beginning, we hungrily anticipated the main course. For entrees, we chose Porcini Mushroom ravioli ($10.95), Chicken Picatta ($11.95), and the Grilled Shrimp special ($11.95). The ravioli that arrived were round pillows of pasta stuffed with finely chopped porcini mushrooms accompanied by a rich porcini cream sauce flavored with a touch of marcapone and nutmeg. Every bite released an intense burst of flavor. On the lighter side, the chicken came with a generous portion of two perfectly done split chicken breasts. The plump, tender chicken was coated in a tart lemon and parsley sauce and sprinkled with large capers. However, as wonderful as these two dishes were, the real star of the evening was the Grilled Shrimp special. This deceptively simple dish contained eight fresh jumbo shrimp that had been marinated in olive oil, garlic, parsley and then grilled to perfection. They were skillfully arranged on a sea of arugula, radicchio, sorrely, and endive dressed with extra virgin olive oil and balsamic vinegar.

We turned our attention towards dessert and discovered that there was only one option — tiramisu ($3.95). Though it rarely lives up to expectations in the North End, we hesitantly ordered one, only to be very pleased with the pie-shaped wedge that we received. It had two layers of sponge, flavored with espresso and Tia Maria and topped by a rich layer of delicious marscapone. We happily ordered another slice, though equally delicious, could have been larger.

After the meal, we spoke to Frank DePasquale, owner and mastermind behind the restaurant. He said that because of the restaurant's small size and resulting lack of freezer and storage space, they must buy their evening ingredients that morning. This makes for truly fresh ingredients and explains the constantly changing specials at the restaurant. We also learned that the restaurant has three other area locations: Harvard Square, Malden and Norwell.

With the table cleared and the conversation reaching its end, we lingered at our table, reluctant to leave Trattoria Il Panino — a culinary Cinderella . ❑

Those wishing to celebrate Valentine's Day Mexican style can check out the Armadillo Cafe in Allston. Their eight-course fiesta menu ($25 per person) includes shrimp salad tortas, shredded beef salad with queso blanco and cabbage. Diners and lovers alike can romance each other while enjoying selections ranging from cold terrine of wild mushrooms and prosciutto with grilled red pepper vinagrette, a vodka-cured salmon gravlox with assorted garnishes , or roasted duck breast and confit leg with three-grain pilaf and a berry-currant wine sauce.

A noteworthy addition to the local dining scene is David's Restaurant, 123 Stuart Street, Boston. Boston Wine Weekend

BY JONATHON ALSOP

Wine culture is a slow-growing vine. Wine lovers everywhere tend and contribute to it, none more positively than the late Anthony Spinazzola, legendary food and wine writer. This year's 8th annual Gala to benefit the Spinazzola Foundation, Friday, February 5 at the World Trade Center, continues to grow as one of Boston's premiere cultural events. This year, the Gala immediately precedes the Boston Wine Expo, also at the World Trade Center Saturday and Sunday, February 6-7, and together they form a mega-weekend of food and wine.

The Spinazzola Gala will feature food from 75 New England restaurants and the wines of 70 vineyards from around the world, as well as a donation and tribute to Boston's hunger relief organizations and their chefs. The list of participating vineyards is daunting, but there are some highlights. Callaway and Culbertson, both from the Temecula Valley region in southern California, will be very interesting to taste. Jepson and Morgan, also from California, and Rex Hill from Oregon are all relatively rare and precious. From the Atlantic northeast, there's Sakonnet of Rhode Island, Westport Rivers from Mass., and Williamsburg in Virginia. Tickets are available at 617-344-4413 for $100 a person.

The Boston Wine Expo is open both days from 1-5 pm, $25 a day or $40 for two days. A dozen celebrity chefs will do food demonstrations, and there are ten complimentary seminars and seven paid tastings for $15-$35. Saturday night is the Vintners Dinner for $75 a person. If you did it all at the Expo, you'd have a pretty comprehensive crash-course in food and wine for about $200. Especially valuable, from an educational perspective, are the paid tastings of rare wines. Again, the list of Expo vineyards is huge, but Arrowood is a favorite. Bonny Doon is always good for stylish new waves in wine, while others to look for include McGuigan Bros. from Australia, and Chamard, Mellea, Sakonnet, Stonington, Westport Rivers and Williamsburg from the east coast. Although it's hard to imagine anything lively in the dead of this winter, wine culture will be alive and kicking the weekend of February 5-7, and Boston's wine lovers will be giving it all they've got. Boston Wine Expo tickets are on sale at wine shops all over town. For more information call 617-439-5110.

Tastings Around Town

Brookline Liquor Mart, Allston: Saturdays, 2-4 pm. 2/6: 1990 Burgundy, nice wines and prices are way down. 2/13: Wines for Valentines, bring a date. Blanchard's in Allston, tastings every Friday, 5-8 pm and every Saturday, 2-5 pm. Winecellar of Silene, Copley and Waltham, Fridays, 4-6:30 pm and Saturdays, 2-4:30 pm. Marty's in Allston, Saturdays 1-3 pm. Bauer on Newbury Street, Saturdays, 4-7 pm. Kappy's in Sudbury and Mall Wines at Fresh Pond in Cambridge, Saturdays, noon-6 pm. Chestnut Hill Wine Cellar, in the old Chestnut Hill Mall by Star Market, every Saturday, 4-6 pm. Gordon's in Waltham, Saturdays, 1-4 pm.

Fine Wine On A Tight Budget

1988 Sterling Vineyards "Diamond Mountain Ranch" Chardonnay ($9) and 1989 Sterling Vineyards "Diamond Mountain Ranch" Cabernet Sauvignon ($9) at Beacon Beverage in Brookline. MSRP: $20. These two California diamonds are in completely different places in their lives. The 1988 Chard is just now crossing the finish line, and crossing strong with mellow fruit, sweet buttered toast flavors, softened oak and nice acidity, a beautiful wine in its total maturity: drink tomorrow at the latest. The 1989 Cab, on the other hand, is brand new, very tightly wound, and not giving up much flavor. After five days in the glass on the window sill, it did begin to show fruit, so there probably is hope. We won't know about this wine for at least another three to five years, but I recommend a mixed case of Chard to drink now and Cab to tuck away till 1996. A tip: be on the look-out for 1990 CdB Cabernet Sauvignon, under $10 starting around the first part of February, could be as low as $7-$8 in spots, although I haven't tasted it yet.

Pinot Envy

Bumper crops of California pinot noir and floods of French red Burgundy have left the wine world with more delicious and affordable pinot noir than any time in history. 1989 Gavilan Pinot Noir ($11), made by Chalone in California, is exquisite in every way: big ripe fruit, no rough edges, creamy and rich, available at Brookline Liquor Mart. 1990 Jadot Pinot Noir ($8) and 1990 Latour Pinot Noir ($7) are both excellent buys on the French side. Normally around $10, last year about $13-$15, the red Burgundies have become very affordable, if you can ever really afford to fall in love with wine.

Tasting Notes

From January 19 Mall-Kappy's-Beacon Bev/Clos du Bois wine dinner at the Mill Falls Restaurant in Newton. 1991 CdB Barrel Fermented Sauvignon Blanc ($7): huge tropical fruit flavors, even pineapple and kiwi, beautifully smooth, rich in toasted wood, very pretty. 1990 CdB Barrel Fermented Chardonnay ($10): served much too cold, very reigned in and tight everywhere, scant aromas, thin flavors, previous bottles have been much better, but I think I still prefer the Sauvignon Blanc. 1990 CdB Flintwood Chardonnay ($16): big, beautiful wine with great body, super vanilla and butterscotch flavors, lovely roasted grain, a real winner. 1990 CdB Merlot ($15): very smooth and creamy, good bright fruit, simple and round, personality reminiscent of some recent California red Zins, very good merlot but not a bargain. 1989 CdB Marlstone ($20): super blend of cabernet sauvignon, cabernet franc, merlot and malbec, great fruit and spice. 1989 CdB Late Harvest Gewurz ($20/half): nice aromas of fresh flowers and super-ripe fruit in this dessert wine, one dominating flavor of dried apricot, little acidity, very short sweet finish. ❑

From Strip Bars to Peace of Mind

Jeffrey Gaines Works Hard for the Money

BY ZACHARY SIMMONS

Jeffrey Gaines is as captivating as Bono is "live," deep as Neil Peart lyrically, and as regular as the guy next door.

Although the Pennsylvania native's album sounds like it was written completely focused inwards, it comes from a man exploding outwards. His sexy, rough, lion-like appearance hints at a covered past, his face bears a few scars and his songs are mined from the hard ore deep inside him.

"Lord knows man, the reason I did this record was to better myself, because my personality, David Lee Roth, as sick as it is, is probably the closest thing to who I've been. Some bad Matt Dillon character from some film has been closer to my life than this record."

Twenty-six year old Gaines lives in and is a native of Harrisburg, Pennsylvania. While he worked for his father installing carpet, he played in cover bands with old high school friends. Eventually, in 1989, he got to the point of being asked to front New York's Maggie's Dream. Instead he stuck it out solo in Philly and before he knew it, he was signed to Chrysalis Records.

Gaines has come a long way from playing covers in strip bars, but he realizes that he could have gone either way.

"I tell you, a lot of my buddies were not as lucky, not as strong, not as focused. They ended up either dead, addicted, or in jail. A lot of them look up to what I'm doing as like 'Yo man, you made it out of here, you're the guy, we're all living vicariously through you.' And in that, again, is respect that I have to my past, to survive, to do the right thing." Jeffrey's interest in music comes from home and different artists that made special connections in him. "I started to sing along to everything, like seventies rock radio. You heard a lot of Elton John, a lot of Beatles and stuff. Those are serious singers. Plus around the house I heard Otis Reading, Aretha Franklin, and The Jackson Five."

Gaines continues, "The Jackson Five made a lot sense, because generally music is adults and you're a kid. Then you see kids and you say, 'Wow, I can do that, I can have that.' You end up just grabbing a tennis racket or a broom or something and start jamming in the basement. It's because of a thing you think and feel. The more and more artists that you see and make sense with your personality and stuff you say yeah, this is me. Like when I saw David Bowie the first time on television he was doing the Ziggy character. I remember him singing "My Death" and how dramatic it was and I said that makes so much sense."

Success in music leads to the disintegration of many artists, but Jeffrey Gaines is one of the other artists who coolly slid into refinement of himself.

"It's not a big deal. I kind of look at it as all passing. Kind of a day in the life. I document what's important to me. I reach my own goals that I've had in my head and make sure that I address them everyday."

Gaines adds, "In the writing, a lot of bands will try to glorify their decadence. They turn that into, 'I'm a shithead, I'm a chauvinist bastard, I'm lazy, I'm a this, I'm a that — so pay me for it.' Lord knows I put the headphones on tight and listen to every word. I looked at it (success) as my responsibility to try to better myself."

His new album is a piece of musical artwork that feels like it was pulled from Jeffrey's soul.

"When I write a song," says Gaines, "It's heavy and it's deep. It's talking about bettering yourself and trusting your instincts. It's talking about peace and being, those are all the things I need to nurture in myself and in the writing process. That's what I'm doing."

The song "Headmasters of Mine" shares the subject of Pink Floyd's "Another Brick in the Wall Part II" but goes miles deeper. A rock version has become a hit using Boston's "The Neighborhoods" to add a hard edge to the song.

The band and Gaines got together through a friend of Jeffrey's who was studying at Berkley. The friend was the bassist in his first band and kept correspondence of what was going on in Boston's music scene. Eventually "The Neighborhoods" (now defunct) and Gaines met face to face.

"So basically," says Gaines, "when it came down to do this thing I just called Dave, the guitarist/singer, and said, 'Here's my plan, would you like to do this?' and he said, 'Yeah!'"

Either version of the song shows the greatness of his songwriting ability.

"'Headmasters of Mine' is probably my favorite song," he says. "Every time when you write a song you try to articulate your feeling as best as possible and in that song there's not a word wasted. When I hear the track it sounds like blood. A lot of the vocal things that I'm doing are very gospel."

The Jeffrey Gaines album is complete and is definitely not a one or two hit album.

Jeffrey explains that, "'I'm Sorry the Very Next Day' is the closest to me on the record. It's the most intimate song on the record. It's a song about resolving relationships. Often times there's that arrogance of youth where you think you know everything. You don't really know your parents aren't just parents, they're people first that ended up being parents."

On stage Gaines' overwhelming magnetism pull his audience into the air. Without the confines of a studio, his voice surges, and he outshines the spotlights as he presents his work.

"When I'm onstage, I feel that I haven't performed all night. I'm not hiding anything. I think it's more frightening to hide because of the fear of being found out. I'd be satisfied to almost talk on stage. When I do Peter Gabriel's 'In Your Eyes,' that's the only time I perform a song."

For now, Gaines is plowing through his music career. In a recent Rolling Stone interview, Gaines talked about his next album (no date yet) as being a physical one. "When I say I want it to be physical," he explains, "I want it to be something you'd react to. You won't have to sit down and take time with it. I feel that I've had that. Now I want to give something back. I don't want to go in the studio and be that critical of myself. Next time I Just want to say 'Here it is.'" ❑

Budweiser New Music Challenge

T.T.'s in Cambridge has been hosting the Budweiser New Music Challenge. Twenty local bands have been battling it out through five consecutive Wednesdays, with semi-finals on February 24 and 25, and finals at the Paradise on March 3. The criteria is similar to that of the WBCN Rumble: four bands per night, judged by members of the business end of music, on playing, stage presence, songwriting etc. Prizes include twenty-five hours of studio time for the first runner-up and a non-exclusive recording contract with the local Cherry Disc label for the winner. Not surprisingly, the contest was masterminded by Cherry Disc owner John Horton, who describes it as "designed to bring forward bands that are right on the edge and just need that extra boost to start them headlining." ❑

Dinosaur Jr.

Unsettled and Unreal

BY SANDY MASUO

For the past eight years or so, Amherst's own Dinosaur Jr. have been leaving a consistently erratic trail of sonic footprints on the alternative music scene with an adamantly idiosyncratic sound that, like their moniker, embodies a combination of the tried 'n true and the young and restless, drawing as much on the groovy allure of Neil Young's acid-tinged melodic folk styling as it does on the finely articulated post-punk anxiety of Sonic Youth. It is a blissfully noisome sound that succeeds in transforming many of the more unfortunate ailments of life — insecurity, awkwardness, alienation and angst -- into music that is vital and at times quite beautiful.

At the heart of these transformations lurks guitarist and singer/songwriter J. Mascis who began to figure more and more prominently as the trio evolved, or rather de-evolved. When bassist Lou Barlow left the band in 1989 to pursue the art of noise with his own band, Sebadoh, Mascis and drummer Murph tried to fill the void with various personnel (including Don Fleming and Jay Spiegel of B.A.L.L.), but by the time Green Mind came out in 1991, Mascis had taken over most of the band's vital functions, writing, producing and playing virtually the whole album.

It's been two years since Green Mind. With their latest album, Where You Been, the band returns to power trio status, having signed on bassist Mike Johnson. Together they plow through yet another evocative montage of the ups and downs of being human. Not only do the songs create crisp vignettes of Mascis' murky, moody world, but the energetic repartee that transpires between his head and his hands goes right to the heart of things with vocals and guitar work that tells it like it is.

The album gusts into action with "Out There," a track laden with squalls of clamoring guitar that rollicks from sharp sheering blasts to choppy waves of distortion while Mascis' words soar above it all, following a course that veers from strangely detached soft spots to more self-absorbed low points that lusciously scrape bottom. "Start Choppin'" begin in the warm, lustrous glow of a mellow guitar intro, then lunges into a meaty but spry number that ends with Mascis meandering away from Johnson and drummer Murph to unwind a fascinating dialogue between himself and his axe which seems to spin its own slipstream story to match Mascis' frayed and chunky vocals.

Dinosaur Jr. - Murph, J. Mascis and Mike Johnson.

The mood shifts a bit with the ecstatically tuneful "What Else is New" in which the mushy moodiness of Mascis vocals creates a high contrast display against the precise emotional elocution of his guitar work. The song fades away dramatically with booming timpani pounding into the distance amid splashes of strings and a stream of strumming acoustic guitar. "On the Way" is built less on contrast and more on momentum with Murph's clattering percussion embellishing the cutting edge of a rough-and-tumble tune that rushes relentlessly onward. The orchestral interjections of "What Else is New" crop up again accented forlorn piano strains in "Not the Same," a song that is as rich in texture as it is bleak in sentiment.

A wave of what amounts to optimism surges through "Get Me." Mascis proto-drawl lingers lovingly over a gently tripping tune secured with swinging lines of sparkling guitar work which eventually ignite into a fiery display of gleaming noise before the end. "Drawerings" is both pluckier and more down to earth as it rambles through the thorny undergrowth of a relentless existential crisis. A craggy tune (elaborate) emerges out of "Hide's roaring, droning guitar intro; "Goin' Home" matches a crisp, clear stream of acoustic guitar with the warm bluster of a good ole' Hammond organ. The effect is very low-key yet upbeat, at times almost whimsical as we embark on a revisionist tour of psychedelia. The brief but sweet "I Ain't Sayin'" launches into action with a big dramatic opening, then settles into a lightly grooving musical saga.

Dinosaur Jr.'s is a paradox — simple yet complex, noisy but tuneful, evasive and clear, challenging to the listener without becoming overbearing. It cavorts around in clouds of intrigue that arise from all these contradictory elements. Let's hope they never settle down. ❑

ALBUM REVIEWS

The Boxed Life
Henry Rollins
Imago Records

Whatever Henry Rollins does is intense. The former lead singer of Black Flag, one of punk's most influential bands, now fronts The Rollins Band, whose music is equally punishing and urgent. Rollins has also published several books of his writing, but beyond all of this, the man is definitely at his best as a "spoken word" performer.

The Boxed Life, more than two and a half hours on two compact discs, consists of Rollins' rantings about everything from condoms to lab rats. Rollins maintains a rage throughout his performance, frequently mentioning his hatred for cops, and emphasizing his alienation from society. But Rollins is also surprisingly funny.

The humor is far from subtle, but on target as he discusses airports and sleep deprivation, human nature and his biology class. He is as funny as he is frightening when he talks about reveling in depression: "When I'm depressed, when I've got the first six Black Sabbath albums playing in my head simultaneously, I'm at my most clear-headed, I'm so defined."

Rollins is a masterful storyteller, and his dysfunctional life makes for great stories. His delivery is often over the top, and he punctuates with screams and sound effects. Even Rollins' send-off – the spooky "I know you" – expresses his alienation as effectively as all of his past work combined.

Young at Heart
Cincinnati Pops
Erich Kunzel, conductor
Telarc

As would be expected from Kunzel and Cincinnati, this release delivers an imaginative program along with a few surprises thrown in for good measure — in this case, guest appearances by Patti Page, Mel Torme and Sesame Street's Bob McGrath. Page contributes the song for which she is probably best remembered, "The Doggie in the Window", while Torme, though impeccable as always, won't make anyone forget what Frank Sinatra and Nelson Riddle did for the album's title song. Elsewhere, McGrath does a pair of tunes from Sesame Street and the Cincinnati School for Creative & Performing Arts Children's Chorus joins in for a medley of familiar Mother Goose rhymes. Kellie McHugh, a family friend who is just about to turn three, auditioned this for us. She gives it an unqualified thumbs up.

Boneclub
"Beautiflu E.P."
Rocket Sound/Imago

Without being poppishly overbearing, this Minneapolis/St. Paul-based band confronts great pop melodies without falling into the Pearl Jam/commercialized trap. Sounding a lot like a heavier Heretix, Boneclub combines Tommy Rey's driving drum rhythms (love that last name) with Dacey Arishiba and John Hausman's dual guitars and pounds out probably the best new major label release so far in 1993 (it was independently released late last year).

Boneclub stirs up the old punk/loud guitar sound of SST instead of inciting the grunge of the West Coast. "Everything's on Fire" unearths Live Skull guitar solos and backs it up with a Nineties groove, making them less of a Black Sabbath tribute than a legit original rock band. Like Heretix, Ex-Skin Yard vocalist Andrew Arashiba's nasal whine perfectly complements brother Dacey's dark guitarwork with a sound that's so full and alive that proves that some bands benefit from an unpolished sound. Like its namesake, "Slo Mo" slows the aggressive attack to tell about a couple's reconciliation in the pouring rain. Arashiba sings, and, like that lingering memory, Beautiflu is a release that's pretty hard to forget.

The Last Call Lady

A Snowy Night of Sledding and The Sevens

BY LAUREN DARE

The Sevens on Charles Street is a great place, and it completely kicks butt against other "neighborhood" bars. My most recent jaunt to the Sevens took place on the night of the "Blizzard of '93" when the entire city was blanketed in soft white and everyone was laying odds that they wouldn't have to go to school or work the next day — so they were out getting shellacked. We had devised a brilliant plan to go sledding down Beacon Hill, the streets of which had about a foot of snow on them (there's a rule in Boston that the road crews can't plow until five days after it's stopped snowing). We wouldn't want our municipal workers to get hurt driving in all that snow so we let it melt a little before we make them go out to plow. Anyway, we did a couple runs down the State House steps doing our best Home Alone impressions (except, of course, Macauley Culkin wasn't drinking 100 proof schnapps when he went down his front stairs). After our innocent merrymaking, we decided we'd best get ourselves into a bar quickly lest our systems be corrupted with all this fresh air and exercise. So we slid down Revere Street, flew around the corner onto Charles Street, and landed smack on a bar stool in the Sevens. It was truly something to see.

The Sevens
77 Charles Street

Beer and wine only

For a Wednesday night, the Sevens was packed, full of the usual suspects: the college-plus crowd, the lock-jawed Beacon Hill contingent, State House groupies, Suffolk Law students, Kennedy wannabes, and me. All the steaming wet coats piled up everywhere made the place smell like a wet hairy dog but it didn't seem to dampen anyone's enthusiasm. After ordering our Amstels (the Sevens only serves beer and wine, but this helps preserve its pub-like atmosphere), we settled back to enjoy the game of darts which is eternally taking place in the back of the bar. It has always seemed a little strange to me that you would want to put sharp objects into the hands of people whose blood alcohol level is surely at the flammable point, but everyone looked like they were having a good time, and no one got hurt. It was sometimes hard to tell the dart players apart from the people waiting (also eternally) in line for the bathrooms, which are big enough to turn around in — if you suck in your stomach.

I have never really considered the Sevens to be a pick-up kind of place; it has always appealed to me as the kind of bar where you can go with your friends, hang out and just enjoy the simple pleasures in life such as beer, camaraderie, beer, darts, and beer. However, even in a place as civilized as the Sevens, there's always someone who has just one draft too many and is suddenly overcome by an army of hormones which take over the command centers in his brain and whisper seductively to him, "That's it, just keep following her around, and eventually she'll realize that she really wants you!"

So I had this grinning bozo who was drunker than a fish in a bathtub of gin standing right behind me every time I turned around. It was becoming a little bothersome, especially when he didn't respond to my subtle attempts to get rid of him. Finally, I had to lay it on the line: "I'd really love to go home with you, but I'm kind of worried about this little cold sore on my lip, and my husband just got out from serving his sentence for assault with a deadly weapon, and he's a little touchy about me talking to other guys, and I just stopped my Librium treatments yesterday so I'm a little JUMPY myself. But if you still want me, that's great, let me just get my coat and gun, I left it right over here someplace..." and what do you know, he was gone, just like that. And I had thought we were really going to start a meaningful relationship. Some people are just so shallow!

In true Last-Call style, I was able to finish out the evening without letting this little incident upset me and without getting hit by any darts, which is always a plus on any night out. If you happen to be sledding in the area, I highly recommend popping into the Sevens for some suds; it's a classy but unpretentious neighborhood bar. Oh, and if you see my friend there, tell him I was just kidding about the cold sore. ❑

• RED HAT 523-2175, 9 Bowdoin St., Bos. You'll feel just like you're in a London pub. Dark and casual atmosphere. Attracts young professionals and Beacon Hill residents. No cover. Casual dress. One of the few places you can still get pitchers of mixed drinks.

•RYLE'S JAZZ CLUB 876-9330, 212 Hampshire St., Camb. If you're a Jazz fan, don't miss Ryles. Downstairs you'll find an older crowd listening to traditional Jazz music. Upstairs is funkier with talented fusion musicians. Feel free to move between floors. Cover varies from moderate to heavy. Casual dress.

•SCULLERS LOUNGE 783-0811, 400 Soldiers Field Rd., Camb. Renowned Jazz singers entertain here nightly. The bar is well stocked, the chairs are comfortable and the walls are paneled, evoking a mellow mood. The nighttime view of the Charles adds an air of romance. Heavy cover. Casual dress but no jeans or sneakers.

•T'S PUB 254-0807, 973 Comm. Ave., Boston. Great food, lively atmosphere and there's always something going on inside. Younger bar-hoppers beware: Only Valid ID's accepted (they're really tough!). Lunches and dinners are delicious and reasonably priced. College and thirtysomething crowd. Never a cover but always a good time.

•THE BARMUDA TRIANGLE 437-1011, 200 Brookline Avenue, Boston. Located just outside of Kenmore Square, The Triangle features live music seven nights a week. Catch Boston's best Jazz early in the week, and kick up your heels to Latin, R&B, Reggae and Rock through the weekends. Full bar. Reasonable entertainment charge after 9:30. Weekly giveaways include free passes, round trip tickets to Bermuda, T-shirts, parties and more!

•WALLY'S 424-1408, 427 Mass. Ave., Bos. Treat yourself to unadulterated Jazz nightly at Wally's. Neatly tucked away on Mass. Ave. not far from Northeastern U., Wally's is easy to miss. The only indication that you've arrived is a small white beer sign out front. The atmosphere is dark, smoky and crowded and above all authentic. Mon. is Blues night. No cover. Casual dress. Arrive early to get a seat.

•WARREN TAVERN 241-8142, 2 Pleasant St., Boston. A funky little bar whose clientiele includes young professionals & athletes. Reputedly having some of the most beautiful women in Boston.The bar now attracts manly athletes. Stars don't mind hanging out at the tavern because no one bothers them. TV is always on for sports. No tank tops. Bring I.D. Please don't drink and drive.

•WESTERN FRONT 492-7772, 343 Western Ave., Camb. A multicultural Reggae and Jazz bar where it's difficult not to get caught up in the rasta spirit. It's dark and dingy inside, but the place sparks alive when the bands take the stage. Cover varies from moderate to heavy. On Sunday nights, visit the Arts Café and enjoy music, comedy, performance art and poetry for only $5. Casual dress.

TIME IS RUNNING OUT FOR THE CHILDREN OF ARMENIA

President Levon Ter Petrossian of the Republic of Armenia has declared Armenia a state of national disaster. He has appealed for assistance from the world "in order to secure the survival of the people through the harsh winter months." Independent studies by UN teams, the United States, the American Red Cross and the International Council of Voluntary Agencies corroborate the severity of the situation in Armenia.

You can help us get precious milk and baby formula to the children of Armenia, the most helpless victims of this crisis. Since 1989, The Armenian Children's Milk Fund has been airlifting supplies—helping to feed thousands of children in Armenia. Won't you help ease the suffering and save lives this winter? Please rush your checks to:

ARMENIAN CHILDREN'S MILK FUND

c/o The First Armenian Church
380 Concord Avenue • Belmont, MA 02178 • (617) 484-3561
All funds go directly toward the purchasing of supplies. Operating costs have been underwritten by Armenian Missionary Association of America

IMPROPER IMPERSONALS

Valentines Day Impersonals! Word to your beloved and belusted, here on the pages of the Improper Bostonian.

Feel the urge to unleash your frustrations or vent your hostilities on an unsuspecting friend or enemy? Look no further than the Improper Impersonals, a forum designed for pranksters, irate neighbors, relatives, maniacs or any would-be target of your acid tongue. Best of all they're FREE! Send your Impersonals to us at Improper Impersonals, The Improper Bostonian, 17 Station St., Suite 7A, Brookline, MA 02146. Or fax it to us at 232-4305.

Mary Claire-
You just kind of wasted my precious time, but don't think twice, it's allright.....

Christopher

Cindy X-
So what if Harvard gave you a B-. You've got an A in My class, my little twinkie.

Hot Dog

Happy Valentine's Day to all the TAD employees!

Scrappy,
Bad ski knee? Long hours at your new job? Still living at home? Save it for someone who gives a shit....

Schlepp Rock

Nancy-
Give me a good schedule and I'll give you the best years of my life.

Love, Chris

P.S.-You don't look a day over 16.

Tricia-
When I asked you out, you said that all I wanted to do was sleep with you. Wrong. I want to cook you breakfast too.

Little Stevie B.

Jack-
You plunged an arrow through my heart, our love is like a work of art. It makes me hot to hear you fart, let's do the nasty in a shopping cart.

Jill

George B.,
Sorry that you had to leave so soon. I guess that you just couldn't figure out that victory thing. Have a lovely move, and don't forget to not write.

Hillary

G the Philatelist
If you ever want to drop everything and run off to see the world (all of it), you know I'm game. Bring the brownies and I'll take care of the root beer.

Ready when you are.

Robert,
I'll never forget that first day we met. No matter how many hours I spend in therapy, I'll never forget that first day we met.

...na

Wussy-boy
How many Polar bears does it take to screw ina lightbulb? None, Einstein does it for them.

Love-your girlfriend.

P.S-I'm proud of you.

Stacy,
I was going to surprise you and bring home flowers, take you out to a French dinner, a show, dancing, rent a suite in Copley Plaza for a nightcap and whatever, and then do the dishes when we got home. But this ad was easy and free so I decided on writing this instead. I LOVE YOU.

Alan

P.S. It's just a joke, please don't lock me out.

The cool night air hovered over me as I stood in a vacuum, breathless, dying, reaching for the air that was just out of my grasp.
I miss you.

B. Shears

Barr
Remind me if I ever think about going on a long car trip with you again that I will kill you before it's over. I value your friendship too much to take that kind of risk. By the way, you still owe me for two tanks of gas, a Fleetwood Mac tape (I've checked the car three times already), and one really bad breakfast at Denny's.

Gus

Verdillia,
I love you as much as when we first met all those centuries ago . You'll always be the one who lights my fire.

-Horace

Ms. Z,
I've never seen anything as beautiful as your ears. I will not rest until they are mine.

-C.P.

Adam,
Thank you for a great ten months together. Just don't screw it up!

Linda

Suzy-
Valentine's Day is fast approaching. You know what That means. You bring the whip and the carrots, and I'll bring the white stuff.

Love-Bruce

Brad,
Looks like we missed each other again. It wasn't an accident. See ya around.

Nancy

Nick,
Heard you had a hell of a time trying to talk your way out of that last one. Maybe you should try carrying a "get out of jail free" card. Or maybe you should just get a clue. Wake up, you stupid little schmuck, or one day you will wake up and she'll be gone. Just a little unfriendly advice.

Mary

Nibbles,
Lisa told me the other night that she lost a bet saying we'd never last together. I told her that she should never take sucker bets. She said that she went double or nothing on the next six months. Let's make her lose a lot of money.

Suzie Q.

Theodore,
Thank you ever so much for the lovely cutlery I received from you. I'm sure that I will use it often as soon as I manage to somehow pull it out of my back. If there's ever anything I can do for you, please do let me know.

Sincerely, Alicia

W.H.
Sorry about the whole bloody mess. I still love you. How about we forget the whole thing over a drink?

V.T.

Happy Valentine's Day to my beautiful wife Rosemary and my new baby daughter Nicole.

Chris,
The good news is - the phlegm-soaked crud ball that was clogging the shower drain turned out to be your hair and not a rat. The bad news is we fished it out with your toothbrush.

-The Lost Boys

how bout that drink? could be fun, ya know... it might never end. Oo!

little me

J.G.
If you try to make me watch one more episode of Gilligan's Island I swear to God I will trough your head right through the screen and click the remote until I manage to somehow change your simple, little mind.

F.S.

Robyn,
I hate you! I hate you! I hate you! I hate you! I hate you! I hate you! That felt good.

Jeff

John The Bartender-
I may have ugly brown shoes, but you're getting old and I can buy shoe polish!

The short kid in the penguin suit

Jan-SMILE!!!!

The Other Woman

Lynne-
Happy Valentine;s Day, my one and only love. You are the world's best, and I wouldn't trade you for a Siamese cat.

Love, Peter

P.S-Well, maybe not my ONLY love.

Slick Rick (i.e. Fred)
You're so full of yourself, it's pathetic. Your idea of a menage-a-trois is me-myself-and-I. If you were both a woman and a man, you'd never leave the warehouse.

The Lopester

The Boys from 805-
Pizza, pitchers, pinballs. The only way to ring in the Chinese New Year's. Same time next year...:..

Louise-
Are ther any NERDS in the house? Say HO! Juicy Brucie has no hair. Juicy Brucie is so fair.

THE END.

Noel,
Congratulations on Erin. But remember you're not fully committed until you get in the tux and put the ring on her finger. Just in case. Good luck.

Ross

Dave
I dont love you since you ate my dog, you fetishist.

Caroline/Leslie
I love you guys. I really do. But after 2am, I just can't stop laughing and I can't take this MBA shit seriously.

Bobbo
Okay, okay, okay. I'll quit one job if you'll give up the sock habit. Endless pajama party! Zoinks! Hugs and kisses (the good ones), my frond. Who's prouder of you than me?

Beau and Giftus,
So, when are you two breaking down and moving in with me and the K? You know you want to. After all, how much longer can your libidos stand it? Would bribing the builders help? You know I'm loaded.

Olive

WHEN'S HORNFEST 3????

Office-mate-o-mine,
Play that Duran Duran tape one more time and I"ll bite your eyes out. Just kidding! Haha! Ice...man. Wuv you...ooooooooh.

Snoozanne

Hey guys!I love you guys! Honest! The four days we shared were the best of my extensive working career - swear! Let me give you my beeper number! And my 1-800 number! And my parent's number! And my social security number! Anyone want my map?

To the Boys at Joe's,
You are the unsung heroes, and the real cogs on which our Enlightened Government turns. God bless us everyone. To make it official: the race is on. Who will be able to afford Al first? My dibs are on Seth. Or Jeff. (Sorry Matt - go file somthing) Hollis - beware the Pod People. Oh, and...Go Heat!

Looooooow Fat

Not unlike the Lord, who giveth and taketh away, Steven Raichlen has invented a working-vacation in New Hampshire in which the participants get to cook and eat, and then, through the pleasant rigors of skiing, have a chance to work it off. Steven's a lively teacher who's also a syndicated, award-winning food writer and cookbook author, most recently of Steven Raichlen's High Flavor, Low-Fat Cooking. He's also one of the few cooking teachers who features a hands-on approach. The location sounds appetizing too; the Snow Village Inn, located on the side of a little mountain. "To be an Inn it has to be off a main road," he says, so this one is. People arrive on Sunday night and are welcomed by the making of a fondue which involves the communal breaking — yeah the gooing and chewing — of bread. The next day certain basics are taught (boning a chicken, smashing a garlic and slicing an onion correctly) and then groups coalesce to make two, three, or four dishes (one zealous crew produced 21 in three hours). Now come the ski passes to Mt. Cranmore where, downhill or cross-country, the "now-motivated-for-exercise" cooks get some fresh air. The next meal is served to them. By night, there's camaraderie in the inn, and because the cozy group is all staying there, there's are no driving problems when, say, inebriation on the bread of fondue could cause erratic navigational patterns. The next day, more cooking. Among the offerings is a low-fat chocolate soufflé sans eggs, cream and butter. In other dishes, though a promulgator of that fashionable culinary stringency, Steve is willing to loosen a bit to withhold the fat here while still bestowing it there. Wednesday, it's goodbyes and diplomas. He also has similar workshops in the sun: Cooking In Paradise is in the Caribbean. Cost is $475.

There's No Chocolate Like Shoe

Lovers wanting to find a way to get their (exclamation!) point across in a theatrical way on any day of the week can take this opportunity to cruise and snack on the fancy candies at Chocolate By Design, culminating in the "Lover's Delight." In a variation on a Bacchanalian theme — drinking champagne from a shoe, while being fed grapes by a teasing lover — with a Wizard Of Oz twist, Linda and Steve Weinstein, owners of the shop, have come up with a package that is as grandiosely charming as it is delicious: a wearably-large chocolate slipper covered with edible "ruby" colored beads that comes with fresh grapes dipped in chocolate. And, for some fantasy inebriation to go with it, a hollow chocolate champagne bottle that can contain a personalized message, along with a chocolate — or a real — rose. This one costs $29.95. One step up to true bubbles and it becomes the Chocolate Lover's ecstasy, for $49.95. Or, there is the handmade heart-shaped chocolate boxes filled with fancy handmade chocolate-truffles, white chocolate, milk chocolate, butter-crunches, chocolate exuding a little tasty frill of sliced orange — and many others, three of them named after the Weinstein offspring. Don't just double park — you'll want to get to know the selection, whose homiest example is Smores, that graham and chocolate snack from a childhood afternoon.

Shades Of Color, Faintly

Though this picture cannot precisely capture the mysterious allure of the handcoloring of photographs that Susan K. Murie specializes in, her form of art has a way of evoking what she refers to as "the gray mood of a gray day." Paradoxically, of course, because handcoloring is in fact bringing black and white photographs to the tantalizing brink of color, a subtle color that is of a different order than the actual color of the house, a tomato, or stone angel in a cemetery — or even person being shown. One of her fondest subjects is the architecture of Somerville, which she reveals to be jampacked with gingerbread, "mermaid's tail, slate-covered mansard roofs," trellis and fence, braided-looking woodwork, and gables. The tints and tinges she adds, suggesting an eternal late afternoon in fall, give a haunting, melancholy flavor to their subjects as they draw in the viewer. Murie's colored photographs, in fact, are the definition of "easy on the eye." It's fascinating, even softly entrancing, to sensually explore the effect of the color, which may only touch a few parts of the picture, on the total image (the overall mood). Another process she sometimes uses involves the use of something called liquid light which softens to an impressionistic and really dreamy form that seems hardly a photograph at all. You may see her work at the Gallery Ltd. on Charles St. or call about commissions.

SOMETHING FOR EVERYONE

Comedy Night on WGBH - Channel 2

Bertice Berry from the cast of "According To Us" a comedy show with a feminist edge.

BY KATHY MATHESON

Go on! Take the plunge! Turn off Comedy Central and switch to - gasp! - WGBH/Channel 2 for a night.

No, this isn't a plea to forego a night of laughs for something educational (we're not that stupid). This is merely a notice that on March 3 there will be a trio of quality comedy programs on TV, a series for which there is really no excuse to miss - especially since The Simpsons are on Thursdays.

The night kicks off with a live broadcast of The Mark Russell Show from Washington, D.C. Political satirist Mark Russell will not only deliver witty, biting monologues on the trials and tribulations of the Clinton administration, but he'll sing them as well. Republicans will surely enjoy this turning-of-the-tables, but Democrats need not despair; Russell takes bipartisan shots and his material will be sure to include GOP topics as well.

Billy Crystal, Milton Berle and Joan Rivers host the next segment of the comedy night in a show called The World of Jewish Humor. Enjoy an evening of history and comedy as you listen to anecdotes from more than 20 well-established comedians including Jackie Mason, Carl Reiner and Neil Simon; the program also incorporates appreciations for performers such as Sid Caesar, Lenny Bruce and the Marx Brothers. And of course, Jewish Humor takes time to look ahead to a talented group of up-and-coming comedians, including Richard Lewis and Cathy Ladman.

Finally, a group of very funny females takes center stage at 10pm in The World According to Us. This Saturday Night Live-type variety program is comprised of stand-up routines, taped segments, musical performances and short sketches - all with a feminist edge.

Originally aired on WGBH last summer, the show has already garnered a significant base of support.

"We got a tremendously good response," said co-producer Judy Stoia, noting that the station received several hundred phone calls in support of the program after its premiere last August.

Stoia stressed that the show was a learning experience for everyone involved, including the members of the studio audience. Free tickets were given out to anyone who wanted to attend the first taping, and they were snapped up within hours of being available. She also said that even if some of the skits may have fallen a little short, the viewers still appreciated the effort and the subjects the show tried to address.

Through the course of producing the all-female show, Stoia said that she and co-producer Nancy Porter "discovered an enormous appetite for this kind of humor." And although they have sent a half-hour version of the show to PBS in hopes that it will be picked up as a pilot program, they have yet to receive a response.

"This is probably too expensive to do as a local show. We need a national network or cable [station] to support us," said Stoia. "Our audience response should demonstrate that this program could have a terrific following."

WGBH's night of comedy begins with Russell at 8pm, "Jewish Humor" at 8:30pm and "The World According to Us" at 10pm.

Call Ticketpro at 931-3100, or visit Out of Town Tickets in Harvard Square/Bostix in Quincy Market.

On Mondays, record label promoters burst, slide, shuffle and prance into the offices of Boston's radio station program directors for another hard sell. One week it's Shawn Colvin's "City," Eric Clapton's "Unplugged" or Paul McCartney's latest. The product may vary from week to week or month to month but the radio station's goal remains the same. "Give the people what they want," as Jimmy Cliff so deftly lyricized. Even if that means not adding a song that's been among the most requested videos on MTV or VH1 throughout the season.

BROADCAST WOOS

by Amy Levine

The fragmentation of radio stations over the past five years, from the all-in-one news and entertainment stop to a diversification that has borne out nearly ten formats ranging from contemporary hits to alternative albums, is the latest buzz word in the business. "Who plays what" and "who wants to hear what" are the two questions of meaning these days, and record label promoters have had to learn to comply with the answers to these questions that are often generated by sophisticated market research.

"Radio stations want to appeal to their target audiences and they don't seem to really care how well a record sells," said Karen Durkot, one of W.E.A's Def-American promotion and marketing managers. It's much harder to sell a song in the climate of fragmented formats, she says, and so the reps have to be slicker and better prepared than ever. "Gone are the days when a radio station can play from Bob Dylan to Motown to Chet Atkins," Durkot said. "That doesn't work anymore. People don't want that kind of variety."

Why we hear what we hear on the radio has become a science. Radio stations do not seek to simply air the hits that are accruing the advertisement dollars on MTV or VH1. They want only the music their target audience demands. This is an important difference from the goal of the record label reps who peddle their CD's in the radio marketplace every Monday in the hopes of promoting whatever song their label has produced. "The record industry views sales as success," Durkot says. "The problem is seeing eye to eye on what will appeal to a given radio station's target audience."

The trick is creating an environment that can give each song a chance at success, says Bill Carroll, Associate Director of Polygram's national alternative promotion. The labels want to sign acts with repertoires they are sure they can market to the increasingly selective radio stations.

Label reps like Carroll and Durkot have to find a way to appeal to the long list of formats that include album oriented rock (in Boston, WBCN and WCGY), contemporary hit radio (WXKS and WZOU), adult contemporary (WBMX, WMJX), alternative radio (WFNX, WERS), adult alternative (WBOS, WBUR), classic rock (WZLX) and urban radio (WILD). Some labels have diversified acts and repertoires that manage to transcend the slew of distinct stations, but others, such as Def-American who promotes the blues-based rock group The Black Crowes, narrow their scope to Top 40 or alternative radio.

After 23 years in the business, Jim Herron, program director at WBOS says he uses the label promoters only as an introductory mode to new music. "We'll review their music and decide whether or not it belongs on our format," he said. "They can call me 'til they're blue in the face but what it comes down to is strictly music." Herron says he'll play anything as long as it fits — but Def-American's Durkot says there are ways of convincing.

That's where the Monday sales pitch becomes an art. Label reps have learned to arm themselves with a "satchel filled with marketable tools," Durkot said. They bring charts tracking how well a particular song is doing nationwide, they describe its exposure on MTV or VH1, they provide the names of dance clubs where some have taken off, they predict its street credibility and they give the artists' tour dates. But despite the size of the satchel, Herron insists, it always comes down to the music.

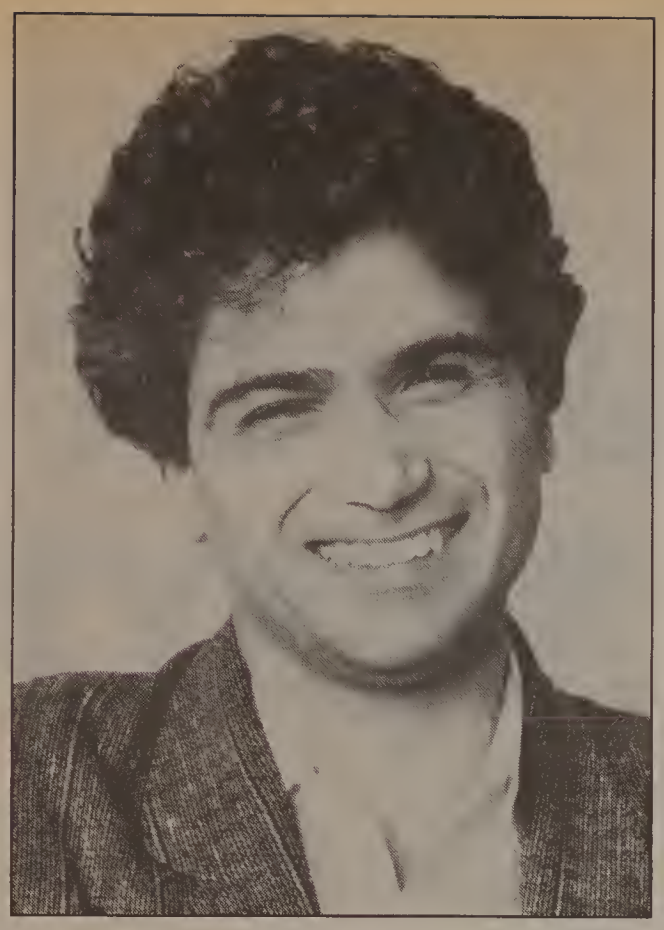
And to prove it, he relies on sophisticated market research and cold investigation to test songs he's planning to add to WBOS's play list. Radio stations use "call-up's" of a cross section of their regular listeners. They play about seven seconds of a song and ask for a rating on a scale of one to five or ten scale. Some stations, like WBOS, actually herd their listeners (whom they pay about $50) into hotel ballrooms to listen to their new release possibilities. In these ways, stations collect a warehouse of data and use them as a guide for satisfying their target audiences.

For the label promoters, the true litmus test is whether or not people are willing to slap down ten to fifteen dollars to buy the sound.

On a recent afternoon at the Tower Records Mass. Ave. location, what was selling were the songs people heard on the radio. Two Tower clerks said the requests pour in. "It happens every minute of every day, it seems," said Brendan O'Neil of the songs people ask for from radio play. Clerk Kevin Goachee said, "People call or come in, singing the tune, bringing in tapes they made from their radios."

"We want to sell a medium the radio stations will use to attract listeners," Carroll said. "It's a very competitive environment." So as a result, it's less and less schmooze and more and more sales.

To that end, a new breed of promoters, known as "Independents" have begun to flood the phone lines and crowd the offices of program directors. They are private consultants hired by label promoters to get the job done. "Now they are a hard sell " Herron said.



Bribing program directors with cash, or Payola or Plugola was the real hard sell of past decades, and as late as 1989. Independent record promotion king pin, Joe Isgro, found himself as the target of a federal grand jury probe that indicted him. Another industry legend, Ray Anderson, also faced charges of Payola in the biggest case since the payola scandals of the fifties, and there are strict laws and punishments against it.

So what are the methods employed by the 90's generation of label promoters? Herron insists he relies solely on the music, but boxes of balloons and food regularly make their way to his office. He has received tour jackets, concert tickets, meals out and most recently, a case full of Cajun foods and spices. As in most business relationships, the record promoters do their fare share of schmooze, but Herron said he drew the line at an offer for a free trip to Florida to listen to a new band.

Payola — as the record play in exchange for big money is known — seems to be strongly out of favor in Boston. Reps from both sides say it would be professional suicide to participate in such schemes, citing respect for the legends that reside here in the city. Bill Carroll cites names such as WBCN's Oedipus, WFNX's Max Tolkoff and Kiss 108's Steve Rivers as pros who would be insulted by the slime of payola offers. But with stiff competition and the growing use of independents can Payola really be such a distant memory? This is a multi-billion dollar industry.

Herron says he has yet to be approached with a deal and spends his time listening to music and his audience. Every Monday morning he plays his answering machine tapes that collect suggestions from listeners and jots down their requests.

"It may sound goofy," he said "but I truly believe the 90's is the decade of sincerity. If you build a good product, they will come."

BUZZ KNIGHT THE PROGRAM DIRECTOR OF WZLX

There you are, scanning the radio stations in your area when you hear an old song that you once loved but haven't heard in years. Or maybe you're listening to the opening chords of the new number one single. Or maybe you're hearing the same annoying song for the fifth time today, and you're tempted to smash the radio. Who thought to put that particular song on? Who decides when, and how often to play certain songs or artists? Which came first, the chicken or the egg?

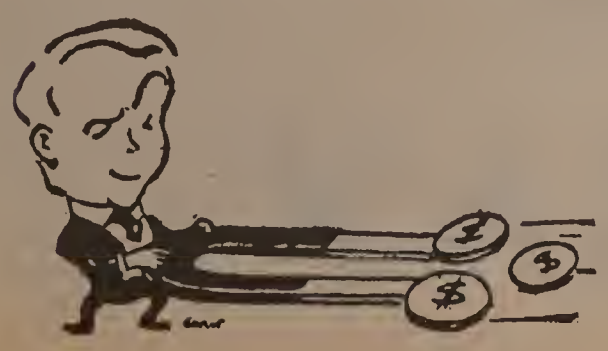
The person responsible for answering these questions is the program director at your local radio stations. While each station approaches programming in its own way, the job of musical selection is clearly more art than science. "You try to learn your market," says Buzz Knight, the new program director at Boston rock station, WZLX, "You talk to individuals in-house and end up using a combination of gut intuition and science." At WBCN, the DJ's buy albums they come across in record stores, and give their input at a weekly music meeting with program director Oedipus. WBCN also has local music directors who listen to bands at local clubs and solicit music from the bands they like.

Once a song is on the radio, it may be heard only in a certain slot, for new music or local music for example. Songs are also played in a certain "rotation," which refers to how often the song is played. Depending on listener requests, the sales of the album, and whether the DJ's like it, the song may move up in rotation, being played more frequently, or out of rotation, where it ends up being played at your dentist's office. While the DJ's have some authority over musical selection, the program director is the final voice on the mix of music on the air, so he's the one you should complain to about your smashed radio.

Another major source of new music is the record companies themselves. Typically, a record company will send a CD to the station along with some materials promoting the band. According to Oedipus, the record company reps who deal with the stations can get very creative in their approaches.

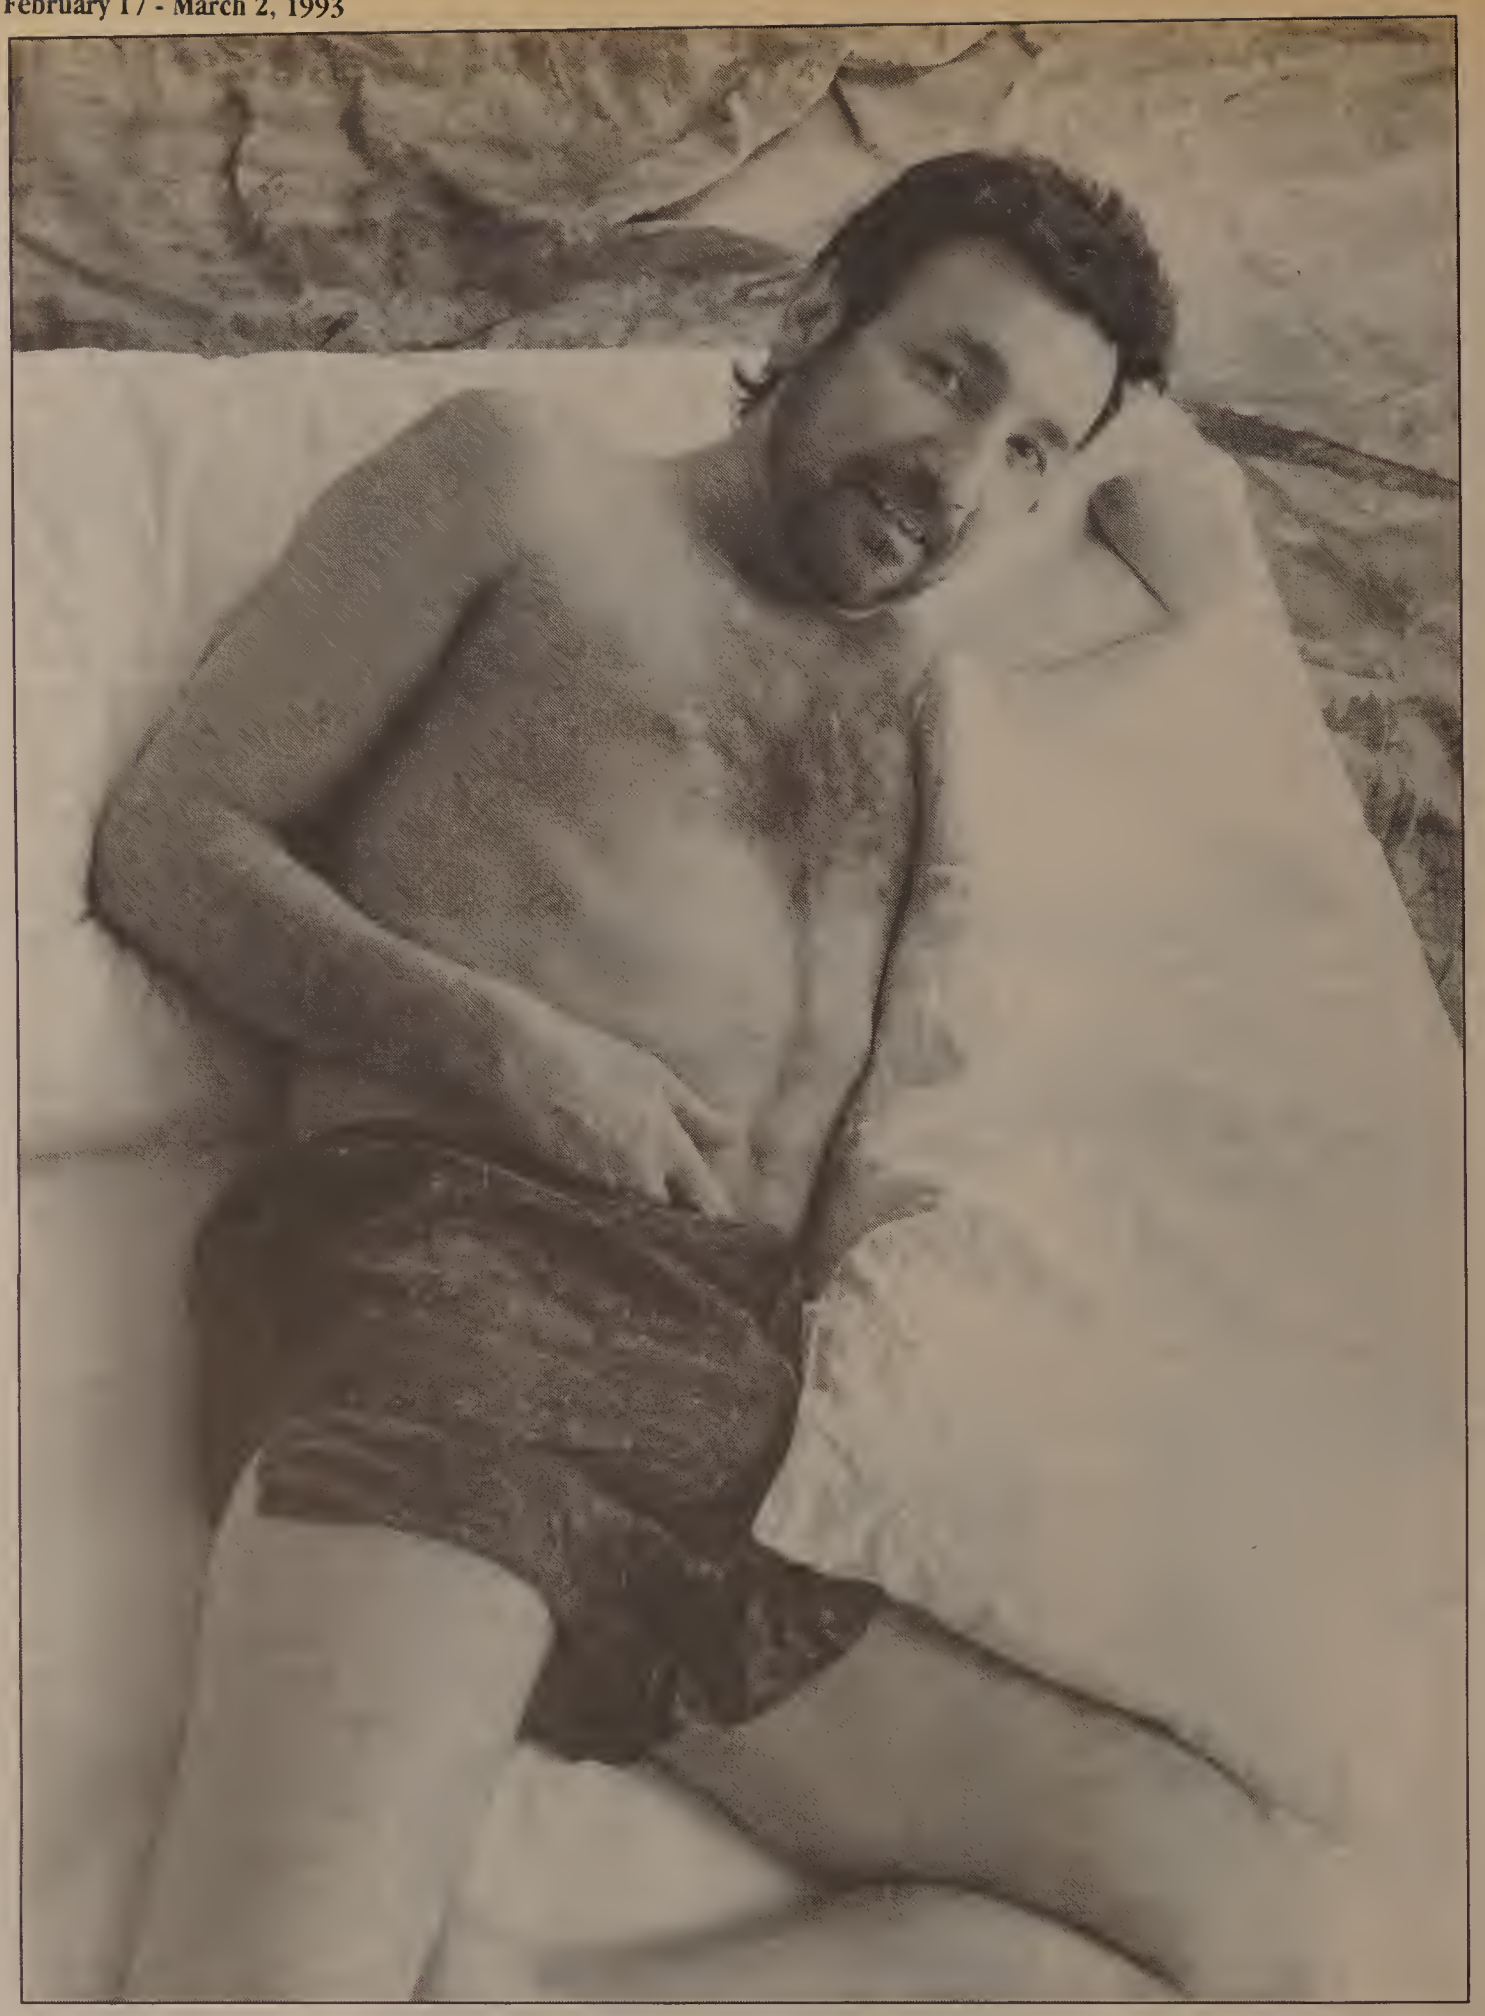
"I've received all sorts of promotional gimmicks" he says. "For example, a band called Baker's Pink, whose name comes from the paint color used on insane asylum walls, sent their CD to radio stations in a paint can. A band called Tackle Box used a tackle box, obviously. Copperhead used a bottle of whiskey with a Copperhead label pasted on it." Buzz Knight agrees "the record company reps are very creative people. They can be really theatrical. I've even had them come in to see me in costumes. They can also," Knight adds, "be incredibly passionate about their acts."

When asked how far reps would go to push a particular act, Knight responds, "They would sell their soul to the devil." John Riley, whose firm J.L.M. handles publicity for many acts, points out that "Ethics are a very personal thing. You deal with many of the same people again and again, so if you sacrifice your reputation, it will come back to haunt you."



Record companies will also organize promotional contests with the stations, sending them free copies of CDs to give away to listeners and providing listeners with free trips to see the band. They also organize junkets for the stations, flying DJ's and program directors into a city to hear a hot new act. While 'BCN's parent company, Infinity, prohibits such trips, Oedipus notes that some stations do accept them in spite of the apparent ethical problems.

Increased airplay generally means increased sales, so all of these efforts are going towards increasing the airplay of a particular act in an effort to play what Knight calls "chart games," trying to get a song to move up in the trade press charts. With millions of dollars riding on chart movements, you would think the industry was ripe for corruption. However, both Oedipus and Knight firmly and categorically deny ever witnessing any sort of payola, which is the term for bribing DJ's or management in return for pushing an act. "It just doesn't happen at this level of the business," says Oedipus. "Payola has not gone on since the fifties." Knight agrees, saying "Maybe I'm naive, but I have just never seen it." On the other hand, if it does go on, why would anyone confirm it to a reporter?



So the next time you hear a song you love (or hate) on the radio, you'll know how it got there. You also know who to complain or suck up to, if you're that type. But instead of picking up a phone and whining, or smashing your radio, you can always just change the station. After all, a new song is just a digitally-tuned, electronically-controlled push button away.

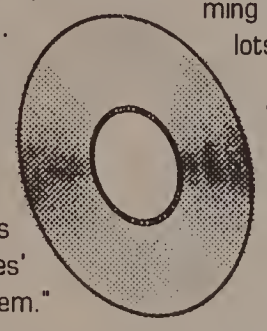
BIG FUN ON THE BIG MATTRESS: AN INTERVIEW WITH CHARLES LAQUIDARA

RADIO PLAY



By Eric F. Peterson

Charles Laquidara is the long time host of The Big Mattress morning show on 104.1 WBCN, Boston. In the course of several recent conversations, Charles talked with the Improper about himself, his show and rock and roll history.

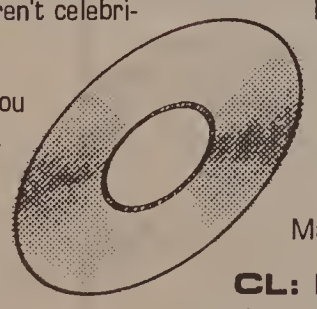
IB: Tell me a little about your personal history.

CL: Well, I left RISD and went to California to learn acting. While I was there, I did a lot of theatre and I actually had a screentest for the movie The Boston Strangler, but Tony Curtis beat me out. I think he blew the director. So I took a job in radio just to make some money for acting. At the time there was only Top 40, AM radio. FM was all classical music. So we used to talk about how great it would be to have FM stereo rock and roll.

When the station I was working at changed from classical to underground radio rock and roll, they let me stay on. So what I did was combine rock and roll with classical music. I would play the Stones' "Gimme Shelter" and follow that with something from Verdi's "Requiem." And people loved it.

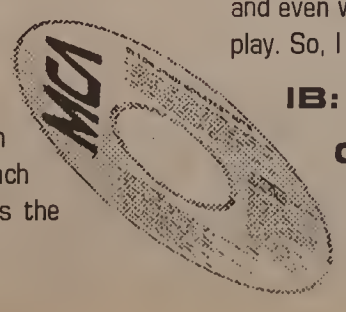
They heard about me in Boston, and 'BCN ended up offering me a job.

IB: What were the early days at 'BCN like?



CL: Well, I joined the station in '69, a year after 'BCN had started. In those days we didn't have much money or equipment or anything. But you know we had crazy stuff go on. Duane Allman would come in and play with Jerry Garcia and they'd do solo stuff. Bruce Springsteen would come in with his band, which included a tuba player. Hunter Thompson came in and was complaining because he had to get up so early and he fucking hated Boston, and hated doing radio, so we just brought him in the production room and gave him a mound of cocaine and he went and did an ID for us, saying it was the best station he'd ever heard. All kinds of craziness was going on. All these stories now are legendary, but when they were happening, we didn't know. We didn't know that these people coming into the studio were gonna die a year later.

Looking back, it was magic. (Laughs) It was fun. We were just having a good time.



IB: Do people still have that kind of fun?

CL: Well, we have a different kind of fun now. There's more of a star mentality now that we didn't have then. They're celebrities now. They weren't celebrities then. They were just cool musicians.

IB: It sounds like the whole radio market has changed, with you guys becoming what AM radio once was. Has that changed what you do?

CL: Yeah! We have become what we protested. I like to think that I'm holding on to some of the principles we had back then. It's just really difficult to do that. But I've evolved a lot. I was always afraid — as we became more successful — of becoming what we were fighting. But it was really difficult to avoid. The '60's were really over after Nixon left office and after that it was all uphill. Society changed. People became greedy, and I guess we all allowed ourselves to be co-opted. The "down" side is, we compromised a lot of our values. The "up" side is that in one fell swoop, I can affect so many things, because I've got so many fucking people listening to me, that I couldn't have done if I had held on to every principle. Even though a lot of my listeners are pretty conservative, they like my show 'cause we push the envelope of good taste sometimes. Now, I can't preach to them, cause they'll say 'Go fuck yourself,' but they'll get it in other ways. Like I told them that anyone who beats up a woman is a real pussy. So I can reach a massive audience and they like me and they trust me. That's the upside of this compromise that we've made.

IB: Ever have any problems with your listeners?

CL: We get some crazies who call, but those are just regular calls. I got a call from a social worker one time about a guy who claimed I gave him a ride to the Cape and asked him to blow me or I wouldn't help his group. The guy was really out there because first, I'm straight, and second, I don't go to the Cape.

IB: Is The Big Mattress different from other morning shows?

CL: I think we're probably the best show in the country that has a mix of information, cutting edge news, traffic, lots of original jokes, skits and programming both political and controversial, with the music of three generations and lots of rock and roll.

IB: Critics of Album Oriented Radio (AOR) have criticized it as standing for "Another Old Rocker." Any response to that?

CL: I think that's an age-ist statement. I mean, would they say, 'another black rocker' or 'another guinea rocker?' The point is that I can still rock. That we can still rock. I suppose at some point we'll stop doing rock and roll all together. Rock and roll used to be a rebellion against the '50's music. Rock is an iconoclastic art form, so by its very nature, it seems to imply youth. But I think youth is also a state of mind. Rock and roll belongs to all of us, to everybody who loves it. I just wish they'd sit down in front of me at the concerts. If I only wanted to hear the goddamn group, I'd buy the CD.

IB: Now that we have the first rock and roll White House, will that change rock and roll?

CL: Well it's been changing anyway. Rock has been co-opted by everybody. They use it for Nike and car ads. I don't know where it's eventually going to go. For years we've been waiting for the next generation of music to take over, and it's never happened. There's no music replacing rock and roll as a musical art form. I'm not sure the new music is gonna take over. Maybe it will evolve. It'll be another form of rock and roll, but it will still be rock and roll.

IB: You talk about rock changing. Has the mission of the music changed along with its listeners?

CL: I think the mission is still to defy. Sometimes, it gets confusing because there's so many different people liking it now. You've got doctors in the operating room listening to heavy metal. CEO's that are Deadheads. The message gets confusing. For example, when Sinead O'Connor ripped apart the Pope's picture, that was rock and roll. A lot of people were insulted by what Sinead did. But what she said was absolutely rock and roll. Religion is a target because rock and roll is iconoclastic. It gets confusing when Sinead gets booed off the stage by all these American Express Card carrying rock and rollers. They missed the point.

IB: Are there any favorite or fondest moments from The Big Mattress?

CL: I remember being hosed on my birthday, when somebody wrote me asking to hose his daughter and pretend I was with the business office at MIT. And when I called, the guy who answered said it was a poor joke because his daughter has been dead two years. I totally panicked, and apologized to him, and then when I was almost crying, the guy says 'Hey, Chuck, is today a special day in your life?' It was my birthday. It turned out to be a bunch of guys who'd stayed up all night drunk and who'd planned to hose me for weeks. I remember the time someone put mescaline in my soup and I ended up going on the air, and even with 50,000 albums behind me I couldn't think of one song I wanted to play. So, I just played commercials for an hour till they dragged me off.

IB: Last question. Can we have Michelle the Rock Babe's phone number?

CL: (Laughs) Yeah it's a 900-number but I'm not sure what the last digits are.

Tout Les Matins Du Monde

"A Sweet Lesson On Loss"

Alain Corneau's film is a somber, beautiful meditation on the nature of art versus commerce. The main character is Sainte Colombe (Jean-Pierre Marielle), a reclusive musician who lives the simple life in the French countryside, where he resists repeated offers to play in the court of King Louis XIV. His young protégé, the flashy, technically-accomplished Marin Marias (Guillame Depardieu, son of Gerard, who plays Marias as an older man), lacks his master's philosophy and joins the royal court. But he returns years later — bloated, bewigged, face heavily rouged — and wonders if it is not too late for him to become the musician he could have. A sense of loss pervades this sad and moving film, with special emphasis on the loss of those opportunities which we recognize only once they have passed us by. A.L.

Lorenzo's Oil

"A Brave and Daring Brew"

Based on the lives of Augusto and Michaela Odone, Lorenzo's Oil is the story of a couple's efforts to save the life of their son from adrenoleukodystrophy (ALD). In this gritty, painful and brilliant picture, the parents (Nick Nolte and Susan Sarandon) not only push the medical establishment for answers, but take up ALD research on their own. while keeping their marriage and their son alive. This triumphant film, which features a truly outstanding performance by Ms. Sarandon, addresses its medical issues and "docu-drama" format with a high level of craft. Nolte's Italian accent is annoying for a while, but it is the only false note in an otherwise important film about the power of determination in the face of helplessness. B.C.

Chaplin

"Portrait of a Genius"

Richard Attenborough's Chaplin is daring in its scope, attempting to follow Chaplin's life from his Dickensian childhood and training in British vaudeville through his meteoric film career, ending with the famous comedien's final years. While Robert Downey, Jr. is up to the task, not just imitating Chaplin but emulating the Little Tramp and the young mogul, the film bites off a bit more than it can handle. At more than two hours, the film could have ended with Chaplin's deportation: what follows is fodder, bordering on the sentimental. Still, Kevin Kline hands in a good performance as Douglas Fairbanks, and the supporting cast of Charlie's family and friends is tapped from a fine well of talent. More might have been made of Chaplin's creative genius and innovation, but the movie remains entertaining and uplifting. T.S.L.

A Few Good Men

"Exciting, Moving, and Funny"

Rob Reiner hits on a fail-safe formula for his latest picture: big stars in a politically-relevant drama, climaxing in riveting courtroom exchanges in A Few Good Men, a film in which two Marines are on trial for murdering one of their own. Lawyers Tom Cruise and Demi Moore try to prove the death was accidental as a result of secret disciplinary orders from above. Tom Cruise reprises his usual hot shot character role with élan, while Demi Moore hands in a respectable and dignified performance as an internal affairs officer. Jack Nicholson, while convincing as a hard-nosed colonel, tends to lapse into Nicholson-ese, playing the sly, smart-mouthed speechmaker. A Few Good Men contains decent comedy as well as moving action, and winning lines are equally distributed. Love Field

Planted On Shaky Ground

Lurene (Michelle Pfeiffer) questions Jonell (Stephanie McFadden) about Paul (Dennis Haysbert) in Orion Pictures "Love Field"

BY ANTHONY LEIBS

Love Field, Orion Pictures' first entry into the mainstream market since their recent bankruptcy, hardly looks like the studio savior they had hoped for. It's a modest little film, with some fine acting, but is far too conventional and predictable to find a large audience.

Lurene Hallett (Michelle Pfieffer), a Dallas hairdresser with a somewhat unhealthy Jackie Kennedy fixation, takes a long bus trip to Arlington National Cemetery in November of 1963, hoping to attend J.F.K.'s funeral. Her husband, Ray (Brian Kerwin), refuses to accompany her, so she goes alone, and meets a quiet black man, Paul Cater (Dennis Haysbert) and his daughter. Originally put off by her non-stop chatter (she twice says of Kennedy, "He did a lot for the Negro," despite overwhelming evidence to the contrary), he is finally won over by her humanity, and the two have an affair.

This film is full of "drama," but the small moments are more effective, and affecting, than the larger ones. The casual way, for instance, in which a police officer calls Cates "boy" is a good example: he says it as naturally as calling someone else "Sir" or "Mister." There's no heat, no malice, but the word still has a surprising sting. Likewise, when Cater gives a statement about a bus accident to the police, he begins by saying, "I was at the back of the bus," and the officer interrupts with, "We know you was at the back of the bus." The officer isn't gloating, or trying to provoke Cater in any way — he's merely stating a fact. We've all seen plenty of beatings of blacks by whites lately, especially white cops, so it's amazing to see how effectively racism can be described by a few simple words, spoken without anger.

But director Jonathan Kaplan and screenwriter Don Roos don't seem to trust their material that much. Cater, predictably, gets beaten by a carload of rednecks later in the film. His young daughter turns out to be an abused orphan he is trying to save from further abuse; Lurene thinks he has kidnapped her, and calls the F.B.I. Bad enough that they have to deal with nasty racial barriers — now they have the F.B.I. after them, as well as every local police force along the way. And Lurene's mildly loutish husband, whose worst previous offense was eating Campbell's soup straight from the can, is transformed suddenly into a gun-toting, wife-smacking psycho.

Michelle Pfieffer delivers an affecting performance as Lurene, despite being saddled with such deliberately unattractive features as peroxide-platinum hair, false eyelashes and blue eye shadow. (Even her chewing gum is blue). Her southern accent sounds artificial and slightly shrill, but then, so do authentic southern accents; anyway, she manages to tone it down as the film progresses, and wins us over.

Dennis Haysbert, a last-minute replacement for Denzel Washington (who pulled out, fearing his character was "too weak") is a genuine find. He has a solid presence on screen, able to express bitterness and rage with simple facial expressions and movements of his large body. He is so good, in fact, that his angry speech about the lot of Blacks seems almost extraneous; anyone can tell how he feels simply by looking at him. But there is the movie in microcosm: not trusting the true power of its quiet moments, going for the "big" scenes, the "powerful" scenes, with police roadblocks and lots of cops with their guns drawn, Lurene transfixed in the police spotlights, Cater's young child wrenched from her arms... That's not even good melodrama, and we deserve better, especially when we sense the filmmakers can deliver it. ❑

GROUNDHOG DAY

Comedy Too Quick To Cast A Shadow

BY TIM LEMIRE

In the movie Slaughterhouse Five, adapted from Kurt Vonnegut's novel, protagonist Billy Pilgrim is "unstuck in time," meaning he leaps from present to past and future and back again, endowed with omnipotence and a unique perspective on time and life. In Groundhog Day, the new Harold Ramis comedy, star Bill Murray has a similar problem: he is stuck in time, stuck in the same day, Groundhog Day — in Punxsutawney, Pennsylvania, no less.

Inexplicably, Murray relives the same day over and over, inaugurated each morning at 6:00 am with the radio alarm playing "I Got You Babe."

Nothing is so difficult to sustain in an interesting way than repetition, and Ramis and Murray, whose previous collaboration has brought us Ghostbusters and Stripes, have proven it to the absurd extreme, giving us a comedy that is without doubt among the best work either men have produced, together or apart.

Murray is weatherman Phil Connors, who travels to Punxsutawney to cover Groundhog Day for the fifth time, accompanied by cameraman Larry (Chris Elliott, playing himself) and new station producer Rita (Andie MacDowell). Connors looks forward to the trip like a visit to the dentist, and when Rita insists that the townspeople love the festivities, Murray replies dryly, "People love blood sausage. People are morons."

Bill Murray in the romantic comedy "Groundhog Day".

Writers Ramis and Danny Rubin give Murray the kind of role he is best at: the sleepy-eyed cynic, played with the off-the-cuff delivery he learned on Saturday Night Live. Murray does well with the role, and has fun (contrary to his performance in Scrooged, where he looked like he was walking through the part only to pick up his check at the conclusion). Murray does play himself to a large extent in Groundhog Day, but so much the better. The part of a weatherman is not too much for him to handle, and he at least adopts TV charm and delivery to make us believe he is a weatherman.

Andie MacDowell displays how naturally she fills a role and how easily she commands attention onscreen with her beauty and character. However, Ramis and Dubin don't give her enough rope to convince us that she is a TV producer; not one technical term comes out of her mouth in two hours, and taking away some attention from Murray would not have risked the success of the movie.

Connors soon realizes the hell he is in, walking through the same set of circumstances every day, although he is free to change his own behavior and influence people around him. The next day, everything is a clean slate. Ramis and Dubin thoroughly explore the many reactions to such a situation, milking as much comedy as they can along the way.

Early on, Murray sits forlorn, drinking with two Punxsutawney locals. "Have you ever felt," he asks them, "that every day is the same, that you're stuck in one place and nothing you do ever mattered?"

"That about sums it up for me," says his scraggly companion.

Murray becomes bored and depressed (he knows every answer on Jeopardy, having seen it 100 times), then elated (he learns information on women to woo them, surprising them the next day when all begins anew), and finally he is despairing again. Ultimately, Murray learns a lesson not unlike the one he learned in Scrooged — and no less sentimental. Ramis and Dubin have more jokes per minute, and a varied score from George Fenton, while hokey at times, keeps things moving.

Groundhog Day is that rare movie that you won't regret paying to see on the big screen, and — amazingly — for a story about endless repetition, a movie you may want to see again. ❑

ALIVE

"A Survivor's Tale of Strength and Spirit"

When a plane carrying a South American rugby team crashes in the Andes mountains en route to Chile, the surviving team of athletes find themselves marooned with little food, shelter or method of communicating with the outside world. Based on a true story, Alive is as much a tale of spiritual discovery as of physical endurance. The men who comprise the bulk of the cast are mostly new faces, with the exception of Ethan Hawke (Dead Poets Society) and Vincent Spano (Rumble Fish). Alive is a moving film — a story of strength and even humor. We follow the survivors daily struggles, and though the cannibalism scenes are not for the squeamish, Alive is a reminder of the fragility of our life on earth. T.S.L.

BODY OF EVIDENCE

"Sex and Fury Signifying Nothing"

Central to any lawyer's case is motive; yet, this simple fact has somehow escaped the creators of Body of Evidence. This latest, Basic Instinct-like sex thriller involves a lawyer named Frank Dulaney (Willem DaFoe) who is defending one Rebecca Carlson (Madonna), a woman accused of killing her rich lover with sex (he had a bad heart) after having worked her way into his will. DaFoe's performance is tepid at best; he gives us no idea who his character is, how he feels about his wife (Anne Archer) or how he feels about himself. As for Madonna, her performance is as one note as her monotone rap in "Vogue." When the film fails to deliver on any wavelength, we end up feeling like the victim of a tease — and in this case, it's a sexual tease of the worst kind. T.S.L.

A B-MOVIE THAT EARNS A B-PLUS

The scene is Key West, 1962, and the latest B-movie thriller from "Shock Expert" Lawrence Woosley (John Goodman) is coming to town. The timing is perfect: the Cuban Missile Crisis has just begun, and the fear outside the theater mirrors the melodrama inside. Writer Charlie Haas (Gremlins) provides us with a fair enough script, replete with irony, some romance, sentiment, and of course humor. Director Joe Dantre recreates 1962 in excruciating detail. The jokes were best coming from Goodman, but the remaining members of the cast are on the level of The Wonder Years. Matinee tends to overreach itself by trying to fit in romance, drama and comedy in one nostalgiac package, but for entertainment value and laughs, the movie earns a strong B-plus. T.S.L.

PETER'S FRIENDS

"With Friends Like These"

Kenneth Brannagh's latest, about the tenth-year reunion of a disparate group of college friends in England, is an absolute stiff. The reason: Rita Rudner's glib and shallow screenplay, which she co-wrote with her husband, Martin Bregman. Lineslike "If there is a God, he takes awfully long lunch breaks," bear the indelible stamp of Rudner's crummy one-liner sensibility. Worse yet, this film also marks her acting debut, making it a one-two combination that floors Brannagh early and often. His acting is fine, but his direction seems mired in the script's banality. The one bright spot is Emma Thompson, Branagh's wife, who looks radiant, and displays a genuine flair for comedy. A. L.

SCENT OF A WOMAN

"Pacino Reeks of Hoffman"

A blind, grouchy, former military officer (Pacino) takes his new prep school "babysitter" (Chris O'Donnell) on a Thanksgiving weekend extravaganza in New York City. While the youth frets for Pacino's safety (and about his own problems at school), Pacino overtips waiters, dances the Tango and correctly identifies the perfume (not to mention the hair and eye color) of every woman he meets. He carries the film, but his performance has a "let me show you that I can do it the way Dustin Hoffman would do it" quality which is too self-conscious. If you want a dose of Pacino, see Glengarry Glen Ross. B.C.

MUSCLE CARS

Pumping Fuel at the Museum of Transportation

BY KATHY MATHESON

If this winter's weather has you colder than you can bear, and you don't have the dough to make it somewhere tropical, grab your imagination and head down to the Museum of Transportation for a visit to their latest exhibit, "Muscle Cars: Wild in the Streets." From February 27 on, you can take a trip back through time to an age where the size of your fuzzy dice determined your status, and where the Beach Boys and Jan & Dean (piped through the MOT's showroom) ruled the airwaves.

Located in the beautiful Larz Anderson Park carriage house (modeled after the Chateau de Chaumont in France), the MOT is allowing you to relive the days of crazy youth with an impressive array of American-designed engine power. While the main focus of the exhibit is cars made between 1964 and 1974, the roots of the musclers are also included, such as the 1957 Chevrolet Corvette.

On display are a total of 14 classic cars in mint condition, featuring a 1965 Shelby GT350 Mustang, a 1968 Camaro Z28, a 1970 King Cobra and a 1970 Plymouth Superbird (check out that fin!). Of special note is a Boston Police motorcycle made by Harley Davidson, complete with sidecar.

Museum spokeswoman Sue Mellen explains that the MOT's extensive network of contacts has made it fairly easy to convince collectors to donate their cars to an exhibit. "It's become a matter of prestige to have one of your cars accepted to an exhibit," Mellen explains.

Last year, the MOT hosted a show called "Different by Design" which highlighted vehicles made at similar times in various parts of the world, but Mellen says that although that show "was very nice and elegant, it doesn't have the same appeal" as a muscle car show.

This exhibit is about "fun, fantasy, youth and youth culture," she says, where the only point was to have fun and push your car to the limit of endurance. "Power and speed - that's what it was all about," she says.

Mellen notes that the MOT hosted a similar display of engine brawn in 1986, called "Power to Burn," which was extremely well received. "It reminds people of their youth," she says, "when we didn't worry about the price of gas and the ecological system."

To really recreate the era, the MOT has built and stocked a garage with authentic muscle car paraphernalia. Additionally, various "owners" and "mechanics" (actors in character) will be wandering the showroom, working on their cars and answering any visitor questions. On some days, the museum promises celebrity guests.

And while you're at the MOT, don't forget to see the permanent exhibits downstairs. There is a children's workshop area as well as several cars made between the 1890s-1900s. Of special note is Isabel Anderson's 1906 CGV Berline de Voyage, which was rigged so that hot water from the radiator could be pumped into the back seat of this touring car. Not only that, Mrs. Anderson, fond of taking long trips but not fond of using strange bathrooms, had a toilet installed in the back seat as well. It's definitely worth checking out.

Needless to say, as I climbed back into my borrowed Volkswagen Golf and turned on the engine to head back home, the word "muscle" didn't exactly come to mind. But as I turned up the heat and began to wind my way back down to the main road, I figured that my vehicle was indeed a sport car - an car named after a sport. ❑

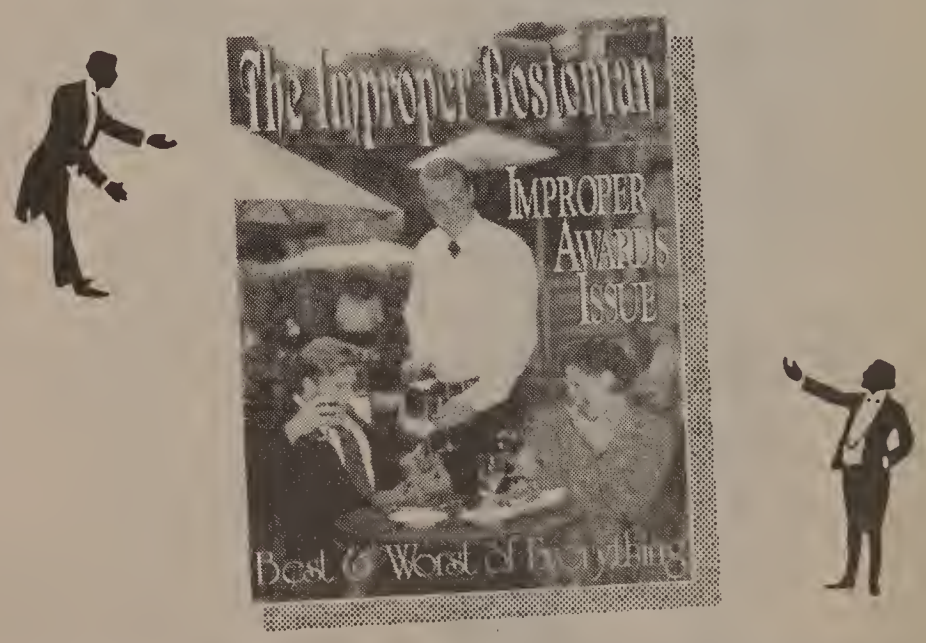
If you're having trouble drumming up enthusiasm over the return of "A Chorus Line" to Boston for the umpteenth time, try taking a charitable view: consider that this two-week stop at the Shubert Theatre (February 23 - March 7) adds royalties to the coffers of the New York Shakespeare Festival, the innovative nonprofit institution where the work originated. If you've never seen this musical, keep in mind that this is billed as its final visit to Boston. In past stops, it's been exhilarating entertainment.

Two popular successes of the '92 Shakespeare & Company season are coming to the Boston Center for the Arts, 539 Tremont Street. Tom Kempinski's "Duet for One" will play March 9-April 4. Inspired by the life of cellist Jacqueline du Pre, it follows the struggle of a world-class musician after she loses the ability to play. "Berkeley Square," by John L. Balderston, based on an unfinished novel by Henry James, will play March 10-28. Written in the 1920's, made into a film, and performed on Broadway and the West End, this mixture of a ghost story, farce, and romance follows a modern American hero back into the 18th century. Mail orders can be directed to The Box Office, Shakespeare Company, P.O. Box 865, Lenox, MA 01240. For information, call them at (413) 637-1197. As of March 1, tickets can be ordered locally, by calling the box office at 426-ARTS.

"Three Guys Who Know Better," a musical evening that is part political satire and part Great American Songbook, plays at the Lyric Stage Sundays, at 7 p.m. on February 14, 28, March 7, 21, 28, April 4 and 11. Jack Bresnahan, Lang Desjardins, and Robert Leinbach play the three guys. For tickets, call 437-7172.

Meanwhile, the Lyric is presenting Ranjet Bolt's new translation of Pierre Corneille's "The Liar" as their main program. This romantic comedy about a young man whose compulsive lies complicate and endanger his love life runs through March 14.



A two-part musical variety show titled "Ben & Brad in Berlin toBerlin," featuring Boston cabaret veterans Benjamin Sears and Bradford Conner, will be at The Performance Place, 277 Broadway, Somerville, Wednesday through Saturday, February 24 - March 20. The evening begins with a music-accompanied monologue, "Kaiser Bill," by Richard Weiss. For information, call Theatre in Process, which is presenting the work, at 267-1053. For tickets, call 254-1125.

Marianne Plunkett, the performer Boston claims as its own since she spent so many years captivating audiences in this city before moving on to New York, was recently singled out for critical praise in a New York Times review of her performance in George Bernard Shaw's "Saint Joan," with the National Actors Theatre. Mel Gussow referred to her as the "one consistently salutary note" in the company's presentation of classics on Broadway over the past two years. She "has gone about her acting with a clear-eyed determination and a talent that shines no matter what the surrounding pallor," with her prior roles leading up to this "impassioned performance." Boston theatregoers know of what he speaks, since they had an opportunity to see her in the same role in the 1985-1986 season at the Huntington Theatre Company. It's one of the Huntington highlights. ❑

MARK LINN-BAKER SAVES FACE

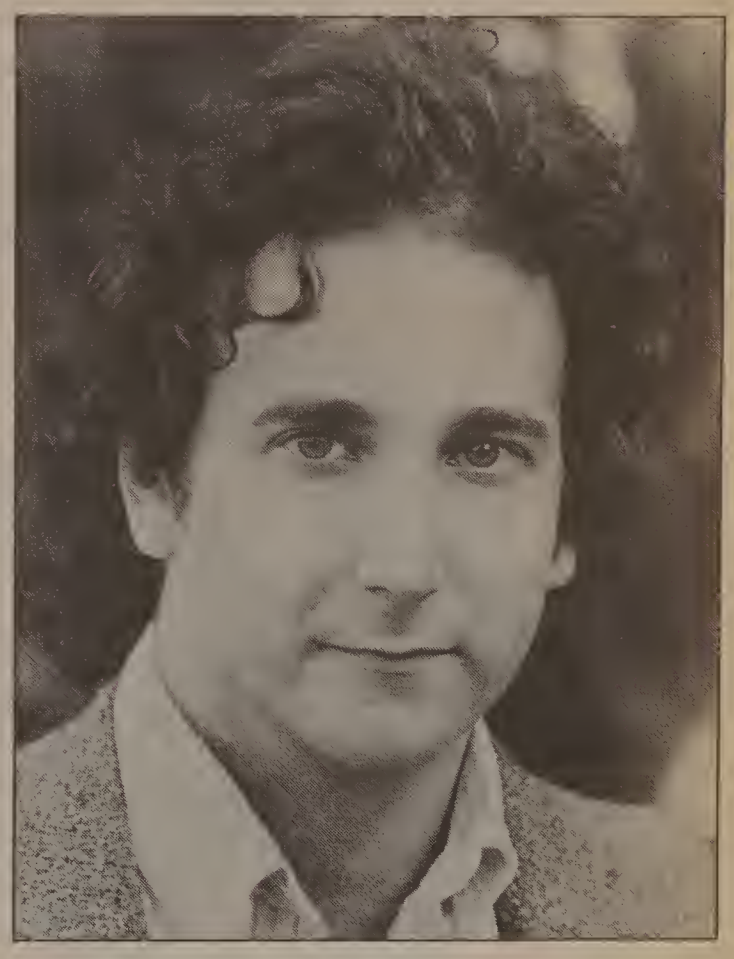
Co-Founder of ART Returns to Boston In "Face Value"

BY TIFFANY A. KEARIN

Given his easy laugh and exuberant nature, it's no wonder Mark Linn-Baker's favorite role is Puck in A Midsummer Night's Dream. This spirited young actor returns to Boston after a ten-year absence to play Bernard Sugarman in the world premiere of David Henry Hwang's comedy Face Value.

"It's a pleasure (to return) ...I've been back to visit the (American Repertory Theatre), but not to play since Doonesbury in 1983," says the Yale graduate. Linn-Baker is best known to local audiences as Robert Brustein's co-founder of the American Repertory Theatre, Cambridge's premiere theater company. He went on to direct the ART's production of Durang's Baby with the Bathwater and to play Estragon in Waiting for Godot, which received the 1983 Boston Drama Critics' Circle Award for Best Play.

Since leaving the Hub for New York, Linn-Baker has worked with some theatrical giants, including the late Joseph Papp, who chaired the New York Shakespeare Festival and brought A Chorus Line to Broadway. "He was a great leader of the New York theater movement," Linn-Baker reflected, with a hint of sadness on Papp's untimely death in his voice. "He left a huge hole in the New York theater scene and will be missed."



He is recognizable to nationwide moviegoers as Peter O'Toole's sober assistant in the hit movie My Favorite Year. "I had a great time and learned a lot on the set of that film," he said of the modern-classic comedy, adding that he was unable to see the recent Broadway musical bomb based on the property.

Also familiar to television audiences as the perpetually annoyed roommate/American host to a Russian relative in Perfect Strangers, Linn-Baker recently finished his seventh – and final – season of the show. "It's sad to see [Perfect Strangers] canceled, but it had a nice run, and I'm happy to move on."

For all his noteworthy appearances on film and TV, however, he enjoys live theater the most. "It's an actor's medium," he explains. "In movies the actor is filmed and doesn't have any communication with the audience, but in live theater you have a real communication with the audience." He thinks that controversial playwrights — like David Henry Hwang, whose previous play M. butterfly caused a stir on its Broadway opening — are especially good at communicating with an audience. "Theater is supposed to inspire and create thought and it's great when a community becomes involved — obviously not when they get angry — because it means that the playwright has struck a familiar chord in the viewers."

After the Boston run of Face Value, Mark Linn-Baker will "take it one step at a time and hope that Face Value settles in for a long run on Broadway." ❑

Face Value runs at the Colonial Theatre, 106 Boylston Street, 426-9366, through February 28. For Tickets call Ticketmaster at 931-ARTS(2787).

The Library Grill

A Tasty New Chapter In Dining

BY R. E. BRUNSON

Imagine yourself seated at a table in the library of a Beacon Hill townhouse. Through a window overlooking the Public Garden you observe bundled figures bustling through the snowy landscape. Inside, a fire blazes in a splendid marble fireplace and a chandelier illuminates shelves heavily laden with books. The dark, paneled walls are hung with photographs of American literati such as Whitman and Twain. A uniformed individual approaches your table and hands you a book. You open the cover and find — a menu?! Imagine no further, for you will have found, as we did, the new Library Grill restaurant in the Hampshire House.

Overcoming our urge to thumb through the books, we concentrated on the menu. The list of items looked creative and contemporary in contrast to the restaurant's strictly old Boston atmosphere. A quick scan revealed a number of grilled dishes, Chef's signature items and several health cuisine selections. While pondering our choices, we were served a wonderful seven grain roll with sunflower seeds and received training from our waiter in how to use the old fashioned seltzer water bottle on the table. In the end, we decided on three appetizers: the Caesar Salad ($6), the Smoked Salmon ($9), one of the healthy cuisine selections, and the Creste Di Gallo ($9) (one of the Chef's signature specials). To go with our selection we chose one of the house wines, a fruity 1991 Simi Sauvignon Blanc ($17).

The Caesar salad came with crisp romaine lettuce lightly coated with a tangy dressing and parmesan cheese. Homemade garlic herb croutons with a definite crunch added to our enjoyment of the salad. The salad's flavor was full of garlic, much to our delight, (anchovies added upon request) and was a perfect light starter for our meal. The next dish was the Cresto Di Gallo pasta appetizer. The exotic Cock's comb pasta was covered with a light cream sauce combined with chunks of tender lobster, green onions, tomatoes, capers, and olives. It was delicious and very pleasing to the eye but the sauce could have used a little more lobster flavor. The true standout of the three selections was the smoked salmon from Kendall Brook in Maine. The dish was striking. The plate arrived with a pool of honey dressing flavored with mustard seed and fresh herbs. Sitting in the middle were perfectly chilled, delicately pink salmon slices arranged in the shape of a rose in full bloom. The rim of the plate was garnished with parsley and a small plate of sliced salt topped bread accompanied the salmon and provided a contrast to the sweetness of the dressing. With this dish, one could not only taste but visually feast on the talents of the kitchen.

For our entrees, the choices were the Beef Tenderloins ($19) and the Duck ($19). While waiting, we listened to the jazz selections played by a trio of piano, bass, and saxophone. Our entrees arrived and were as pleasing in taste and presentation as the appetizers had been. The char grilled tenderloin medallions were surrounded by a rich port sauce with slivered mushrooms, topped with fennel seeds and accompanied by three red potatoes skillfully carved into the shape of mushrooms. The beef was rare as requested and so tender that the steak knife wasn't needed — it could be cut with the fork. Vegetables on the plate included large grilled slices of red pepper, zucchini, and eggplant, all framed by minced herbs on the rim of the plate. The marinated Moulard duck breast was sliced and arranged atop a mound of wild rice. Surrounding the rice were julienne carrots, zucchini and peppers that had been stir-fried in toasted sesame oil and garnished with slices of fried lotus root and sesame seeds for an Asian touch.

For the finale, we chose the bittersweet chocolate torte ($5) and the frangipane pear tart ($5). The chocolate torte had a thick, wonderfully chewy base covered with a rich, not too sweet, chocolate ganache. The pear tart had a deliciously light frangipane (almond based) filling that encased moist slices of pear. Both desserts were presented on plates painted with bold stripes of mango and plum sauce and garnished with tiny chocolate shavings.

In concluding our meal, one of our party remarked that the Hampshire House usually brings to mind the Bull and Finch Pub (Cheers). All were in agreement that this will soon change with the addition of the new Library Grill — a wonderful new chapter in the story of the Hampshire House. ❑

WAITER! THERE'S A FLY IN MY SOUP!

The cry is repeated millions of times each day across the nation. Today it is the waiters themselves, the service lifeblood of the American eatery, who are crying for help. The newly incorporated Waiters' Association, a professional rather than a labor organization, is here to help the nation's estimated 1.8 million restaurant service personnel to gain the status and benefits they deserve. The purpose of this organization is to serve as a network for waiters to job search, exchange ideas, and stay informed. An insurance umbrella is also in the plans. The association's monthly newsletter deals with how to improve skills, reviews service related books, stories, profiles of American waiters as well as a help wanted section for those seeking employment. If you're interested in the organization call 1-800-437-7842, or write the W.A., P.O.B. 11320, Takoma Park., Maryland 20913.

In Vino Veritas

Going Natural

BY JONATHON ALSOP

When it comes to headaches and wine, everybody has a different story. For some people, it's red wine that causes the woe. For others, it's champagne. Some people can ONLY drink champagne, because everything else gives them headaches! It's all over the map. Of the 425 scientifically verifiable chemical compounds that give flavor to wine (not even including the ones that contribute no flavor), which one or two in the Frescobaldi Chianti gave my friend Jay his blinding headache after last Saturday evening? Maybe it wasn't even one or two but a combination of 40 or 50... no one knows for sure. I have this pet theory/bad attitude that it's not the wine at all that gives you the headache, but the people you drink it with. Needless to say, I'm having trouble obtaining research funding for my hypothesis.

A couple of years ago, a mess of European jug wine was yanked off the market after traces of automotive coolant, of all things, were found in some bottles. Sadly, this sort of stupid tampering reinforces the image that even fine wine is something manufactured, an un-natural processed food, subjected to God knows what. Wine is a complex and dynamic psychoactive substance. Granted, it "does" something to you on many levels.

All wine contains sulfites. Sulfites have been known to cause reactions in asthma-sufferers, but only in people who are already highly asthmatic, and they know better than to drink wine. Sulfites are naturally-occurring sulfur-oxygen compounds that result from fermentation. Many reputable wineries add sulfites or subject their grapes to a sulfur "bath" as a preservative technique. In moderation, it's nothing to worry about. Simply avoid cheap jug wine, which is often over-processed, mishandled, highest in the additives and preservatives you don't want to know about.

Finally, all wine contains a little bit of the turf it grew up in. It's the same with any produce, or even a Mrs. Field's chocolate chip cookie. If the soil had a little pesticide or herbicide or fungicide in it, you better believe the grapes and the wine have some too. The key, again, is to buy quality wine, whose elements are almost always at a minimum. Diamond Hill Vineyards in Cumerland RI, for instance, makes delicious pinot noir from five acres of grapes, and it's about as "organic" as can be.

Saturday, February 20, Ian White and the gang at Marty's in Allston are hosting an "organic" wine tasting from noon till 3 pm. Also new in the shop is The Consumer's Guide to Organic Wine by Robert Johnson and Richard Pasichnyk (MSRP $19.95, but probably selling for less). Lately, because of customers' interest, they've gathered their "all-naturals" together in their own section. We got together a couple of weeks before and tasted a few right off the shelf.

• 91 Rizzardi Soave Classico $9 – very light and fresh, a little short on fruit, bracing and dry, had a sharp spiky flavor like the inner rind of a pear; very good with appetizers or seafood, natural "just because." (Ital.)

• '91 The Organic Wine Works Chardonnay $11.50 – organic on purpose, perhaps single-handedly responsible for "organic" wine's bad reputation with wine lovers; incredibly strange, strong scent of Michelin rubber in the nose, spritzy and odd, you'd never have guessed it was chardonnay, maybe a demented Riesling or a Balkan sauvignon blanc gone bad: in a nutshell, avoid. (Cal.)

• '90 Frey Gewurztraminer $9.50 – cloudy looking but lots of bright flavors, tastes just like gewurz, a decent value, nice spritz, buy now, drink tomorrow. (Cal.)

• '91 Lolonis Fume Blanc $8.50 – delicious wine, everything California sauvignon blanc should be: bright and clean, fresh tropical fruit with a little citrus, kept pesticide-free by legions of ladybugs and praying mantises. (Cal.)

• '90 Orfeno Rosso del Uccellina $10 – soft and round, easy tannin, nice fruit, simple Italian red, good wine but hard to recommend for $10. (Ital.)

• '91 The Organic Wine Works "A Notre Terre" $9 – a real winner, probably a blend of zin and pinot noir and something else; aromas of nuts and almonds according to Karen Bell. I got alcohol and tobacco in the nose along with earth and leaves, bright purple color, deep and dark flavors, like a blended Rhone; very nice, a great bargain organic or not. (Cal.)

• '90 Lolonis Zinfandel $11 – an outstanding wine in an outstanding year, big raspberry and strawberry flavors, nice soft tannin, creamy finish, easy to recommend at $11. (Cal.)

• '89 Coudoulet de Beaucastel $17 – unbelievable fruit, crazy tannin, not for everybody but a real winner for the eccentric, huge barnyard aromas, essence of raw meat and sweaty leather as well, proves you don't have to go cheap to get an all-natural wine; I loved it in every way. (France)

In a nutshell, avoid current vintages marked "organic" or "natural" (the OWW "A Notre Terre" is the only notable exception) and look for wines that are made natural because of quality control.

The Spin Doctors Can't Be Wrong

An Inside Look at Rock's Latest Phenom

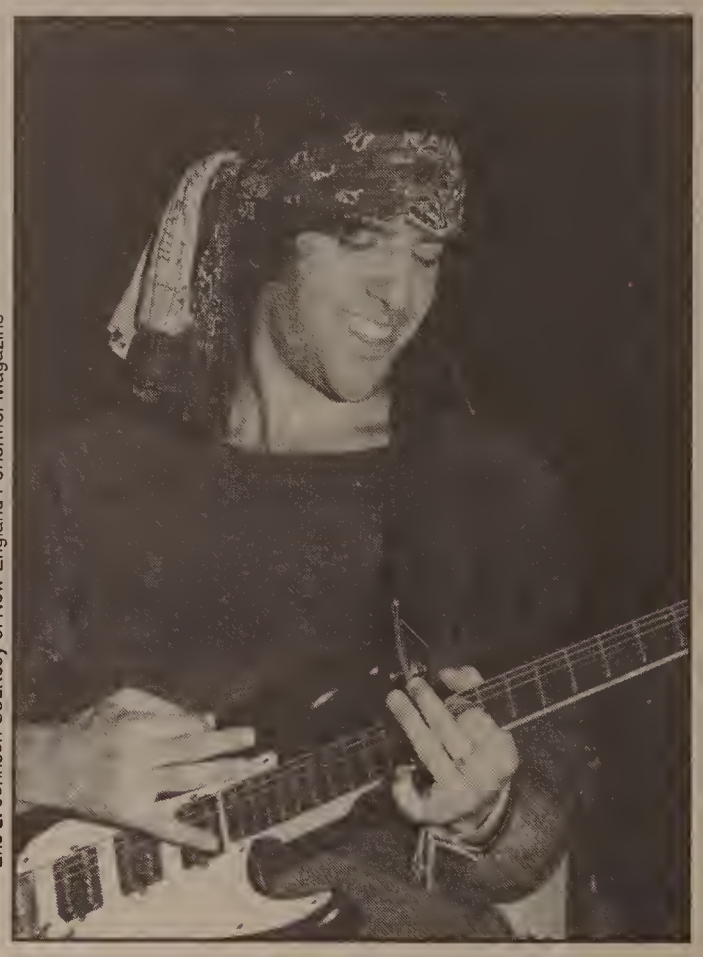
BY ZACHARY SIMMONS

While Epic/Associated was busy with Pearl Jam's Ten, the tour crazy Spin Doctors sold the first 60,000 copies of Pocket Full Of Kryptonite pretty much on their own. Now, with a little push from the label, the album has sold a million copies.

The band has been in Billboard's top 50 for twenty-nine weeks. Two of their songs, "Jimmy Olson's Blues," and now "Two Princes," are high in the nation's radio rotation and the band can be found on the cover of January 7th's Rolling Stone: The Spin Doctors are spiraling forwards.

"All this feels great," said singer Chris Barron, backstage at the band's Boston Garden show at the end of last year. He folded his arms and legs and jutted his chin out. "I feel grateful mostly. People bought our records and called up the stations and requested us. This is really a business of, if people ask for you, then you do well."

Traveling from place to place is becoming a permanent way of life for theSpin Doctors. Last year's HORDE (Horizon Of Rock Developing Everywhere) tour took them all over the States, with a Lollapalooza-like crew of neo-Dead bands, including Widespread Panic, fellow success-story Phish, and the Doctors' longtime parent group, Blues Traveler.



"We just tour all the time man," said the shaggy-haired Barron. "It's a science. It's an art. Rock and Roll is as much of a moving business as it is a music business. A lot of it is just moving boxes of equipment around. Our crew has it down pretty pat."

Don't expect, however, to see the Spin Doctors (or Phish for that matter) on the HORDE II tour later this year. Epic/Associated has bigger plans for their hit machine.

Guitarist Eric Schenkman, Barron, and his long-time friend, harmonica player John Popper, first got together in New York City under the name Trucking Company. When Popper left to join Blues traveler, Barron and Schenkman started the Spin Doctors.

"It used to be great in the old days," Barron recalled. "We had a ball. We called it the Manhattan Tour. We played five nights a week. We made a living out of it. We put the band together to support ourselves...It was just the two of us [Barron and Schenkman]. We had a gig before we had a band. We put the band together for a gig and we've been together ever since."

All the spirals that trademark the Spin Doctor's packaging, are actually brought to life in their shows. Barron's dancing, singing and talking, Schenkman's spontaneous thirty-minute guitar solos and bassist Mark White and drummer Aaron Comess' deep funky drive, all work together to sling the crowd into the dizzying circles the band took their name from.

Why is this man smiling? Eric Schenkman loves his riffs.

"There are two things that I focus on, basically," said Barron. He twisted himself around and pursed his lips, then smiled. "Actually, three things: singing, dancing, and the raps between tunes.

Onstage, Barron looks like he's made of rubber.

"Dancing, you have to be careful. It's kind of the same thing as singing. You've got to rock the crowd, but if you get yourself out of breath in the wrong point of the show, then you're not going to sing the tune right."

The Spin Doctors use their funky, bluesy, poppy sound to weave themselves into the fabric of their audience. Barron strengthens this connection, not just through his singing, but with his talk between songs.

"With the raps, I try to make them with good content, well said, eloquently put," explained Barron. "I try to bring the crowd into the next mood of the next song. I either bring them down into a slow song, or up into an up song."

The band themselves seem up about everything, during the interview no one was without a smile; later, if you heard laughter down the hall, it meant one of the Spin Doctors was there.

"Success really agrees with us. We've been through thick and thin together, now things are great. We all pat each other on the back and we're just happy."

As far as the future goes, the Spin Doctors expect nothing but forward motion.

"We want to make a lot of albums." Barron opened his arms and grinned. "We want to play all over the world, to have an international career and also put out a lot of records — as many as possible." ❑

Bulkhead

The Gears Are Grinding

Bulkhead and Feline Friend in a Relaxed Mood

BY PAUL AUSTIN

When Plunk, the full-length debut from local avante-pop stalwarts Bulkhead, finally hits the bins in a week or so, there's sure to be such a massive sigh of relief from the band that their Jamaica Plain HQ might drop a couple of inches. Although the much awaited 12-song disc has been in the can for several months, the usual litany of indie rock delays (most, of course, having to do with cash flow or lack thereof) have kept Plunk off the streets thus far. "But now the gears are grinding," offers vocalist Pete Ryan. "Or at least they're finally audible."

Ryan, along with guitarist Tom Devaney, bassist Stuart Walmsey and drummer Chris Foley, have settled on the highly regarded upstart label, Sonic Bubblegum, to release Plunk, their initial foray into the digital age. The CD follows a pair of singles — one on Carolina's Moist Records and the second on New York's Rockville — that brought the band not only good notices, but a hard lesson in self-promotion.

"Sonic Bubblegum is a good fit for Bulkhead," explains Devaney, "and probably would have happened sooner if we hadn't been wrapped up with the previous labels, trying to figure out just what they were and weren't planning to do with us. Rockville was a straightforward one-off arrangement for the "Psychic" single, but the first one, on Moist, was initially part of a bigger plan. Moist is down there and we're up here, so when they got all involved in the Monks of Doom or somebody, we sort of faded. ["For Bulkhead," deadpans Ryan, "Moist dried up."]. Mike at Sonic Bubblegum is right here, he's into it, and although some setbacks occurred from the original release date last fall, now we're pretty excited."

Bim Skala Bim

What Are They Up To Now?

BY DAVID FENIGSOHN

With the national success of bands such as Aerosmith, Extreme and now the Lemonheads, Boston has earned a reputation as a guitar town. And while Boston certainly has its share of guitar-rockers, the next hottest Boston sound right now is ska, a high-energy, horn-blasted version of reggae.

At the top of the heap of Boston ska bands are Bim Skala Bim, who have been playing locally and nationally for seven years. Now, with the release of their fourth album, Bones (on their own Unsigned Records), and heavy gig schedule, the band is about to take off.

"The market for ska music has definitely been growing over the last year and a half," says vocalist, Dan Vitale. "The first time we played San Francisco about six or seven years ago we had about ninety people show up and this last time we had 700. I think there is a lot more interest in the scene generally, due to a lot more new bands. Here in Boston there are some that you may not have heard of yet, but they are starting to make headway: Mr. Cranky, Thumper and the Hi-Hats — they're all great bands."

Bim Skala Bim are a pretty great band themselves. On Bones , they stir their patented combination of rock, reggae and ska into a hard-hitting mixture that is all their own. Vitale's vocals are at the forefront of the mix, while Vincent Nobile's trombone blasts in with leads. Guitarist Jim Jones adds licks and vocals, all in front of one of the tightest rhythm sections in the city. Bones features two potential hit singles, "Wandering Soul" a collaboration between Vitale and Jones, and a cover of Pink Floyd's dead horse ,"Brain Damage," which Bim Skala Bim make over to their own unique style.

Bim Skala Bim in a primal mood

"We are getting airplay at WFNX, a real lot with 'Brain Damage.'" Says Vitale. "We are also getting commercial airplay for 'Brain Damage' in Washington D.C. It's been on the CMJ [college radio charts] top one hundred for seven weeks now, moving up and down between a hundred and eighty. Hopefully it will go up a little higher. And commercial radio in Philadelphia and New York has been playing 'Wandering Soul.'"

Vitale directed the video for "Brain Damage" (which consists of clips of Bim Skala Bim live at the Paradise a few months back) and has now sent it off to MTV's 120 minutes.

Bones is Bim Skala Bim's second album with producer Lou Giordano (The Lemonheads and Sugar). Vitale is satisfied with the parternship. "Lou is a good producer. He has a good ear for things, especially guitar, he's just really good at guitar. He's also not a really frilly producer so he doesn't tend to overproduce things which is an advantage. Certain songs are first take for the drums — certain songs are fourth or fifth take for the drums, same for the vocals and the horns. Mostly it was the songs that we been playing for a while, we got on the first take, like 'Wandering Soul' is almost all first take and it's one of the best songs on the album. We did it at Fort Apache studio in two weeks.'

But to fully appreciate Bim Skala Bim, you have to see them live. The band throws themselves into their fast-paced show with enthusiasm and professionalism. Nobile, his shaved head glistening, waves his trombone around wildly, driving the crowd into a frenzy, while Vitale bounces about the stage, pumping his fists and clowning with the rest of the band. The band is also preparing to release a live album, tentatively scheduled for this summer.

"The live album is basically done." Says Vitale, "We recorded it at two different shows at the Paradise, about two months apart, with a 16-track mobile unit. So we've got a ton of film, and we've got ninety minutes of material mixed down, and now we have to decide what we want to put out. I feel it is a good representation of the live show. The live album will be bits of all five albums. I say five, because the fifth studio album is almost done as well. And some of the songs from the next studio album will be on the live album as well." ❑

And Bulkhead's legions of local fans will be too. Plunk includes re-recorded, hotter takes of radio hits, "Vote The Man" and "Psychic," plenty of the group's live staples, and enough of their trademark dance-with-dissonance pop mutations to support Devaney's claim that the disc, "documents our shows over the past couple of years." Devaney continues, "Carl Plaster, who does our live sound, produced it — we got a really natural, live sound that holds the energy of the shows. We didn't want to fuss too much with it." Mission accomplished. The edgy, guitar-fueled ferocity of live Bulkhead is intact, and if there's one notable difference it's the emergence of Ryan as an expressive vocalist with an ever-widening range of inflection.

"Vocals are really at a disadvantage in Boston clubs," says Ryan. "Usually you're just trying to cut through the din. On the record you can hear the songs as they're supposed to be heard, which is nice."

Dubious P.A. systems, by the way, aren't Bulkhead's only gripe with the Boston music scene. "People don't seem to want to like bands with pop sensibilities," smiles Devaney. "They'd rather stand in front of a stack of Marshalls and get blasted out by sludge rock. But there are bands here that rock just as hard — The Dambuilders, The Flying Nuns, ourselves — and also have good melodies, cool songs."

But Bulkhead's take on pop is hardly mainstream — Roxy Music meets Black Flag would be a good jumping off point — so it really is only a matter of time before grunge rock fans start trading in their flannel-of-the-month club cards, for music like Bulkhead's that takes the T home with you — whether your walkman is on or not..

"There's just so many onion-skins of alternativeness now," says Ryan, "you really need aggressive management or some gimmick to get noticed. Part of us still clings to the idea that the music is enough. Our goal is pretty modest — to be able to make records that see the light of day, and get judged on their own merits." With Plunk, that should finally happen. But whatever the future may hold, Bulkhead is strapped in for the long haul..

"Tom and I just took the Juliana Hatfield-Evan Dando [Lemondheads] platonic relationship band seminar," deadpans Ryan. "Hugging issues, that sort of thing. So we're ready." ❑

ALBUM REVIEWS

Tackle Box
On!
Rockville Records

In a time overly dedicated to creating a sound, Boston's Tackle Box remember the songs. Their debut, On!, is packed with loose-limbed, persuasive, faintly jittery writing — direct and simple style, sharpened by hints of cynicism. From the breathless, almost frantic "Head Of a Pin," to the sweet sway of "Anything And Everything," singer Greg Kendall negotiates love's small aches and pains with a gentle, slightly strained, very human voice. But the band's always there to pick him up, tumbling through "Near You," whooping it up in "Big Creep," rolling pop and garage rock into one and sloshing plenty of guitar over bolt-upright rhythms.

Far from sounding contrived or tired, On! is slap-happy and on the mark, the work of a band who's actually enjoying playing together. And there are no songs about fishing. Great.

Bob Dylan
Good As I Been To You
Columbia

It may seem ironic that the penultimate songwriter of the last three decades releases a CD of traditional and public domain folk and blues songs. Yet, Dylan does not merely "cover" these songs — he inhabits them. The opener "Frankie and Albert," better known as "Frankie and Johnny" finds Dylan in fine voice. "Canadee-I-O" is a fascinating tale about a girl who pays her sailor boyfriend to smuggle her aboard a ship to Canada. The boyfriend and his friends decide to hog tie her and toss her overboard (legend has it that a woman on a ship is a jinx). Yet the captain foils their plan when he not only rescues the woman but marries her! The expressionism and phrase in here is nothing short of brilliant. On the closer "Froggin Went A Courtin'" one wonders if Dylan might have a sideline career doing children's records. A gleeful dementia seems to inhabit this song. I've heard it said that the singer and song are father and son, not one in the same, yet Dylan delivers these songs like they were truly "written in his soul."

Learn To Lose
Get Hip Recordings

The Cynics — pride of the Pittsburgh area — play psyche/punk for the nineties. With a dozen or so singles and seven albums under their belts, Learn To Lose is their most recent recording and their best so far. The line up is Michael Kastelic (vocals/harmonica), Mike Michalski (bass), Gregg Kostelich (guitar, vocals) and Tom Hohn (drums, vocals). Joe west provides keyboards on two cuts, and ten out of twelve tracks are originals. With the opener "Never Again," it's evident that the Cynics have gotten more adept at writing songs with more interesting changes and well-crafted arrangements. "Learn To Lose" is the kind of song that Kiss should be doing today. "Haunted" is where passion and madness merge again. This is the"Too Much to Dream Last Night" of the nineties. Combos like the Dolls, The heartbreakers, Kiss and Alice Cooper were cool, but The Cynics make rock "n" roll that transcends nostalgia.

Th Faith Healers
Lido
Elektra

It's loud grungy music just, like everyone else is playing these days, but for some reason Th Faith Healers do it better. On Lido, lead singer Roxanne Stephens' chants, melodies and screams take equal turns characterizing songs like "Hippy Hole" and the slower, intensifying "Don't Jones Me."

Short, cyclic lyrics like those to "Reptile Smile" comprise most of Th Faith Healers' repertoire. With Stephen's "Alright/Out with it/I'll admit/It's all my fault/I'm sorry/O.K./Cause there's reason for my reptile smile" chorus, and the alternately droning and straining guitars, the song is a tribute to lyrical and musical economy. Towards the end of the album the band slips into a semi-ballad called "It's Easy Being You" that sounds like Boston's own Drop Nineteens, were they to grow up and move to England.

Now that Th Faith Healers are around, minimalist grunge-pop should soon raise its head as a prime addiction among new music fans.

Ned's Atomic Dustbin
Are You Normal?
Chaos

Asked about the differences between Ned's Atomic Dustbin's new album, Are You Normal? and their debut, God Fodder, head bass player, Alex, quickly replies, "The biggest difference is that the new one's better than the first." It's a simple overview, but it's right.

The new album averts the sophomore slump by focusing more on what can take place in the studio, instead of what takes place onstage. On Are You Normal? the Neds finally show some studio savvy, melding layers of guitars and basses with samples and a lusher drum beat, while keeping the energy of the live sound.

The time spent in the studio gave lead singer Jonn a chance to elaborate on his vocals. While his lyrics still don't really reach any kind of depth, his voice now regularly steps out of its clichéd monotone to reach for a tune instead of a rhythm. Devices like these are what make "Suave And Suffocated," "Swallowing Air" and "Walking Through Syrup" standout songs from an album by a much-improved band.

The Frames
Another Love Song
Island Records

Yet another exciting debut from Great Britain. Last year the Levellers released one of the year's most exciting albums, and now comes Another Love Song, a dozen quality tracks from this Irish six piece.

Keep your eyes and ears open for the music of The Frames , one of Ireland's hottest bands. Their album Another Love Song is available on the Island Records Label

Not all the songs here are great, but they are all played with passion and intensity. "The Dancer" and "Masquerade" are simple three chord rock, played in a Clash-like manner. But Noreen O'Donnell's back-up vocals and Colm Iomaire's violin add texture and depth to all the tracks. "Telegraph Poles" and "Right Road" add melody to the band's raucous sound.

There are some flaws. Frontman Glen Hasard's songs are better than his rather average voice. Producer Gil Norton (The Pixies, Echo and the Bunnymen) does a good job working with what he has, but minus the Irish accent, Norton could be any local screamer. And while this would be a fantastic six song e.p., about half the tracks fail to distinguish themselves. But the band covers some unremarkable material with superb delivery, and five or six tracks stand on their own as potential make-it-big singles. And I'd bet ten-to-one they are a hell of a live band.

The Importance Of Being Chuck
Square Records

On their new disc, Chuck force out all their opinions in a way that suggests that lyrics come first and music second. Fortunately, even through all their rhetoric, the band still shines. On typical songs like "Melanin Thing", Joe Peek's smooth voice gives rise to a memorable hook that locks tightly with the band's dense funk undercurrent. In "Bush's Barbeque" Chuck take on the former president, with a swinging beat, incriminating samples from the mouth of the man himself, and a no-nonsense chorus: "I said we're on our way /To Bush's Barbeque/They tell me we're free, baby/But you know we're freezing".

Ironically, The Importance Of Being Chuck's cover is almost more elaborate than the album's music. Inlaid with pictures and descriptions of revolutionaries including Harriet Tubman, Fidel Castro, and Jimi Hendrix, the artwork is a tribute to the band's influences — both artistic and personal. Together with the music it's a complete package from Chuck that shouldn't be missed.

Gavin Friday
Adam 'N' Eve
Island Records

The lyrics to each track on Adam 'N' Eve are printed in a different font, which is indicative of the many styles on Friday's latest album. At times he sounds like a poorman's Tom Waits, growling in a voice soaked with whiskey, at others the music moves like the pumped-up dance rhythms of the Soup Dragons, and throughout the album, Friday tries on most every style in-between Adam 'N' Eve's best track — and only song that really scores lyrically — is "Falling off the Edge of The World." "Charlie Darwin I believe you now/Put the monkeys in a uniform/Stormin Norman up on the hill/Twenty rounds with George B./Let 'em choke on coke 'n' oil." Friday grunts out the words, backed by a double bass and a hammond organ.

"Fun and Experience" and "King of Trash" have danceable backbeats, but only Friday's unique voice makes them distinctive. While "The Big No! No!" has some substance behind the music, "Why Say Goodbye" is little more than a pop ditty.

Superb Upcoming Concert Performances

Daniel Stepner, Handel & Haydn Society Concertmaster, performing with the H&H period orchestra at Symphony Hall, Boston

BY PETER CATALANO

Lorraine Hunt, who lives in Boston, has become a national celebrity. Friday, Feb. 19 and Sunday, February 21 (both at 8 p.m.) she's guest of the Handel & Haydn Society, America's oldest continuous performing ensemble. Directed by concertmaster Daniel Stepner, H&H calls this program "Baroque Concertos and Cantatas," featuring two vocal works: Bach's cantata Mein Herze schwimmt in Blut ("My heart swims in blood") and a Handel cantata. Don't miss this concert. Tickets are $17-$45; call 931-2000 for reservations. There are $6 rush tickets available before the performance — a real bargain.

Equally compelling is Roger Norrington's assay of Beethoven's majestic Missa Solemnis, perhaps the composer's crowning achievement, surpassing even the Ninth Symphony. Norrington has a lot to say about Beethoven and most find his performances to be highly provocative. These performances with the Boston Symphony are on February 25, 26, 27 and March 2. Call 266-1492 for early reservations. Tickets $19-$52. Hurry, they're going fast ❑

Classical CD Report

BY PETER CATALANO

A good mid-price performance on disc of the Missa Solemnis can be heard on TELARC's label with Robert Shaw and the Atlanta Symphony. The soloists are quite good (although the men sound a little distant) and Shaw manages to get his arms around this cathedral-sized work with many very fine episodes, particularly the "Credo." My colleague, Stephen Brown, also recommends John Eliot Gardner's interpretation with small chorus and period instruments on DG. He praises the clarity of both the playing and difficult, instrumental-like choral work.

On a more disappointing note are two sets of arias harmoni mundi has released with Nicholas McGegan conducting. The principal bait for these recordings are two sopranos known to Boston audiences— the above mentioned Lorraine Hunt, and Lisa Saffer— the former singing arias Handel wrote for the soprano Margherita Durastanti and the latter for Francesca Cuzzoni. The problem on both these discs is the mincing conducting of McGegan, whose style throttles the radiance of Hunt more so than Saffer. Only the cuts from Guilio Cesare by Saffer have any staying power. I'm also chagrined that the "authentic performance practice" of limiting the high note of the few appogiaturas (those dazzling embellishments left for the singer to invent), which undermines the excitement potential.

On these cold winter nights I've also found myself listening intently to the Rachmaninoff Vespers performed by the Robert Shaw Festival Singers on the TELARC label. These pieces are scored for unaccompanied Choir and the RSC is among the best anywhere. Written for all-night vigils celebrated in Russian monasteries on the eve of religious holidays, the vespers retain many ancient Russian chants and monophonic songs. Two of these 15 standout and are sung with a tenor soloist: "O Serene Light" and "Blessed Art Thou, O Lord." Goes well with cognac. ❑

Improper Update

After almost two years as Editor-In-Chief of The Improper Bostonian, Tobin A. Streett has announced that he will be leaving the paper and relocating to Los Angeles, California. Toby, who will function in his current capacity for two more issues before departing for that "other" coast, has been with the newspaper since its inception. After relocating, Toby will be assuming a position with one of Hollywood's major film studios as a professional script writer and editor. He will be sorely missed.

A new editor will be appointed at a future date.

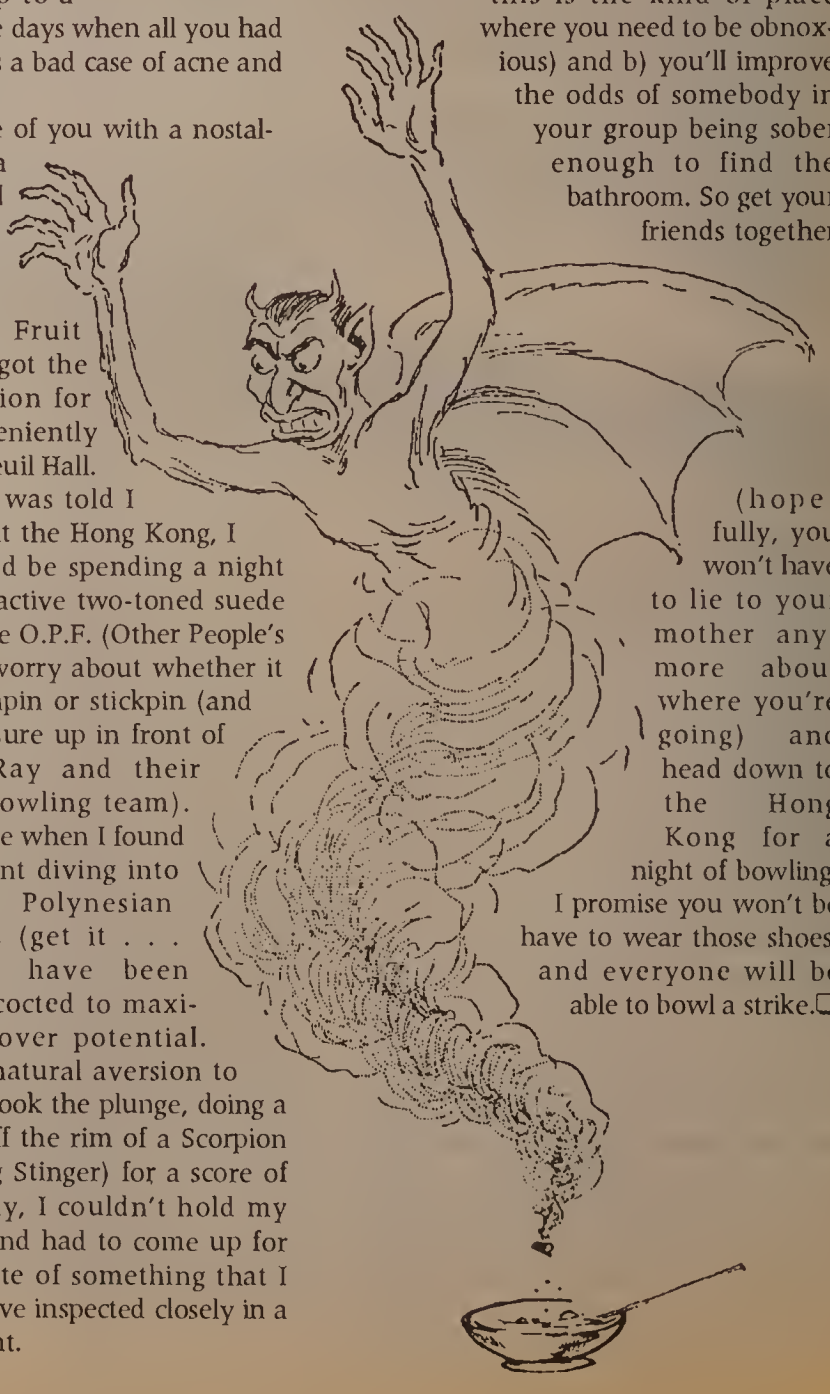
THE LAST CALL LADY

Bowling for Libations at The Hong Kong

BY LAUREN DARE

Remember in high school when you'd round up a bunch of people, borrow someone's mother's station wagon, (for your trip to the library, right?) and head to the nearest cheesy Chinese restaurant? You know, the place where little pink umbrellas in the drinks were de rigeur and management would let you drink using your neighbor's cousin's friend's I.D. (even if their gender didn't match your own)?



Weren't those the days? Drinking things with names like Polynesian Zombie Nectar and eating Pu Pu Surprise platters (Big Enough to Share With a Friend!) added up to a big night out, in the days when all you had to worry about was a bad case of acne and flunking gym.

Well, for those of you with a nostalgic yearning for a good greasy egg roll and a Tahitian Treat (25 Different Liquors combined with Tempting Fruit Juices), then I've got the ultimate destination for you, located conveniently in the heart of Faneuil Hall.

Now, when I was told I could go bowling at the Hong Kong, I naively thought I'd be spending a night wearing those attractive two-toned suede shoes that smell like O.P.F. (Other People's Feet). I began to worry about whether it was candlepin, tenpin or stickpin (and how I would measure up in front of Flo and Billy Ray and their Saturday night bowling team). Imagine my surprise when I found that bowling meant diving into one of those Polynesian Potpourri Bowls (get it . . . Bowling?) that have been thoughtfully concocted to maximize your hangover potential. Overcoming my natural aversion to alcohol, I bravely took the plunge, doing a back somersault off the rim of a Scorpion Bowl (It Has a Big Stinger) for a score of 9.8. Unfortunately, I couldn't hold my breath too long, and had to come up for some air and a bite of something that I probably would have inspected closely in a more sober moment.

As with so many places, the Hong Kong is only as fun as you make it — but believe me, the good times will seem never-ending after you polish off your first Scorpion Bowl. You'll begin to have so much fun that you'll hope sobriety eludes you forever. By your second Scorpion Bowl, you start to wonder if you're ever going to sober up, and by your third, you don't care if you do; you've forgotten your own name, and are ready to elope with the busboy who's been looking better and better with every sip. Luckily, your friends are there to save you from this sorry fate (the Hong Kong is best experienced if you go armed with at least three friends because a) more people can get away with being obnoxious (and this is the kind of place where you need to be obnoxious) and b) you'll improve the odds of somebody in your group being sober enough to find the bathroom. So get your friends together (hopefully, you won't have to lie to your mother anymore about where you're going) and head down to the Hong Kong for a night of bowling; I promise you won't be have to wear those shoes, and everyone will be able to bowl a strike.❑

Shea Man,
GET BETTER !! And stop getting naked. The nurses will talk. Punch Bobby once for me, okay?
Susie

Robyn,
Please forgive me. I'm young and foolish. I was abucted by alien Elvis impersonators. My hairline moved that day. My dog ate my homework. I lied to Congress. My father told me I was a disgrace. I wasn't myself (literally). I'M SORRY!!!
Jeff

B.M.
I never had more fun on a bus in my entire life. My voice is still hoarse. Looking forward to seeing you again.
JJ

Teddy,
The Earth Moved. The Planet Revolved. The Bed Shook. What do you mean, you're still not satisfied?? What does it take, blow up dolls? Electronic devises? Psycho, twisted B&D stuff? I suggest you start taking those hormone pills again, cause baby, you need help.
Sally

There once was a girl named
Kaffy
She definitely was sort of daffy
Then she got married
And got kind of scary
And now getting to see her
Is like pulling taffy.
(Hell, it rhymes, don't it?)

Caroline/Leslie:
I missed you! You could have taken me to the Pub if you really loved me. Next time I see you, I'll be forced to gack on your OM books.
xxoo—Curtis

To All the Girls I've Loved Before (and one in particular),
Stop bitching about me. You never tried once in your lifetime to care for anyone half as much as I cared for you. Any pain I caused you, you asked for. And I know that you're the one whose been pranking myanswering machine, so you might as well not bother anymore.
Dan.
P.S. I hate your stupid cats.

Peter,
I know it may seem odd to you, but studies do show that normal people eat out more than once every other month. And that doesn't mean McDonald's.
Hope.

Chi,
YOUR sister's ass.
Q's sis

Hal,
You're such a little cry baby. Don't worry about your father, who cares what he thinks? We haven't seen you in the bar for months now. The place just isn't the same without you. C'mon, grace the old tavern with your presence once in a while. You can't be that busy.
John.

Buffalo Fans,
Ha ha ha ha ha ha ha ha ha ha. One, two, three, you're outta there. It was beautiful, a work of art. See you next year.
Dallas.

Adam S.,
Good luck man. You're out there doing what we all wish that we had the nerve to go and try ourselves. Don't stop swinging, and let us know when we get our next job. By the way, can you get us some comps?
The "Meta" Gang + Jason.

M.J.D.
Happy Valentine's Day; I love you more and more each day!
Love, your wife

Loowoomba
Oh great master of the unknown. Spiritual guide and omnipotent presence. Tell us the whereabouts of your former link to our plane, the one called Philbo.
He owes us a turn.

Ali and Dave,
Sorry if I disturbed you, I wouldn't want to be an inconvenience at all. Hope I didn't get blood on anything important. Six stitches if you're interested, but don't worry, they're all very small.
Ross.

Joby,
To tell the truth, I didn't think Mom could be any more mad at me. Thanks a lot for proving me wrong
Your Bro'

Don't go, please don't go OH GOD DON'T LEAVE ME AAAAAAAH. A pox on you and the whole West Coast.
Sniffle.

Howie,
No, I'm serious, man. I woke up a total blank. So, please tell me what happened.
Ari

Reena,
Where the t@*% do you get off!? Just because you decide to mess up your own life doesn't mean you have to mess up your "freinds." You drove away several good friends because of your petty paranoia.. I hope you're happy now!
Love, The Thursday Night Party Gang
P.S. Next itme you get drunk, carry a Trojan!

LAC,
Never, never, never. I will never again let myself get into that trap with you. I can't believe that I could ever care for such a selfish, insensitive, uncaring child. You may be older than me, but that doesn't mean that you are in any stretch of the imagination mature. I hope you had a good time last weekend,and don't worry about how miserable I may happen to be, not that you ever did. It's not your concern.
I.C.

Steve S.
The Riddle of the Sphinx: What has four brain cells in the morning, three brain cells in the afternoon, and two little -bitty, eensy-weeny brain cells in the evening? Answer: Read it again in the morning and maybe you'll be able to figure it out.
Deb.

To the very drunken married man at the Bell and Hand last Thursday who called me a slut because I wouldn't talk to him,

M.
If you do anything to harm me, you'll never figure out the truth. Only I know the answers to help you put the pieces of your mysterious past together.
Toad

EFB
You crazed maniac! Leave me alone. I don't have what you're looking for, so leave me alone.! Why don't you try that fat cop or the nutty lady with the knives. -
Nic

Robyn, Laurie & Wendy
If you think I'm a walking hormone now, just wait until I get to know you both
The new guy

My not wanting to talk to you had nothing to do with your being married and everything to do with your drunken, disgusting conversation. You asked a few minutes into conversation if my friend and I were wet yet and we so rudely walked away without a response when we really wanted to tell you that you and your big ego are all dried up. Lucky you're already married because believe us you ain't no prize.

Pussycat,
I named the 40 different types of flowers. Now where is the beautiful bouquet we agreed upon?
Anti-Welcher

You jerk. California? Beverly Hills!!?!Who are you kidding. You can't stand life outside of New England.

To P.F.
My Vietnam Hero...Can you believe that we're celebrating our 25th anniversary this week?? Thanks for always loving me - and for believing in me, too. The kids are gems...a miracle indeed. Don't get discouraged - you'll get your boat when the last kidlet is through college (cringe) in 2004.
Love ya - me.

Larry the Lizards Drinking Buddy,
I hear they just passed a new stiff law against your brand of illicit activities. You had best use your forgery skills to get yourself a visa and a ticket out of the country.

Sharon, While I do love you and enjoy your company., marriage to you would be like a rose. It would be great at first, buit two weeks later... Jim

To the owner of the silver-grey Volvo that cut me off as I was trying to merge through the artery off of the bridge to go onto Storrow Drive but was not able to because you were driving a nice safe Volvo and decided that you needed have no concern for the safety of the other drivers thereby running through the intersection at the speed of light, almost swideswiping me and causing me to veer so that I missed the exit and was forced to drive ahead and turn around in order to get onto Storrow: You're an asshole.
The Blue Oldsmobile.

Monica,
Remember Valentine's Day a year ago? Probably not, you've had too much whipped crem. Oh, by the way, congradulations! You've disproved the theory that girls get nicer as they get uglier. Go to a real college, maybe they'll teach you how to be civil. While you're at it, grow a clue, Farm Girl.
The Injun

Paula,
It ain't about hair.
Dave

Hi, Tad!
Even though you're in Australia your incredible musical talent, amazing wit, and strange sense of humour transcend the Pacific.
Love, Margie, Misty, and Calico

Stacey,
I know it's been years since we went out, but I hope the man you marry pisses you off daily.
Mike

Laura,
Every time I think that I should have stayed with you I just hit myself with a sledgehammer. The pain lasts almost as long & it's a lot cheaper.
Eggy

Caryn,
I hear you're moving to D.C. . . .maybe all your "friends" will pitch in and get you a case of penicillin so you don't have to curve your social life.
Your Ex-boyfriend's Bro

R.G.,
Please be more careful about getting your blood all over the office. You know people can get diseases from stuff like that. Go bleed someplace else.
-D

Kelly,
Calling the cops on your brother who has only helped you was the last straw. You're one pathetic little girl acting like a grown-up. I hope your happy in your new apartment (in a year it will look like the projects). You deserve everything you get, you treated your brother like a criminal. Now you don't have one. Now you don't have one; remember...you treat people like shit, you smell.
From Everyone

StarMan:
Alright, alright. Instead of actually working (God Forbid) and making money (how bourgeois), why don't you, me and the Sewel Sister start a commune? We could do it in Newport (NOT) or the wilds of upper New Hamp. Sound fun? Hah ha! Isn't life a lark. See you at the Fag Western.
Sister Golden Hair Surprise

To the man with the nuke in his head,
You'd better call the psycho soon. He is getting fed up with you. Watch out for bright red spots of light on your forehead

Dearest, sweetest Q-ball,
"Who's that ribbed, rippling, fair-haired, financially-strapping Golden Boy?" Boy, if I was walking down a Boston street and I saw him walk by, I sure would flirt. And giggle. And wink suggestively. Like any gal in Atlanta, Washington or, yes, even New Yawk would. How could we help ourselves? How could any woman resist? (I can't do no mo!)
Kisses and blood tests, Sis

Jen,
What's it like living Fatal Attraction? Remember, don't forget to stitch back his ears.

Captain N,
You think that the pressure is off now. You think the weight's been lifted. You think you'll be able to sleep at night now. Well you're wrong Smart Guy. I'm going to pay my neighbor a visit and borrow some of his toys. Then I'm going hunting. You can run, but you can't hide.
-Doom

Lou: You chicken. I have no respect for a guy who cannot do the right thing. I know that my dog is a better man than you.
Weez

Nick D,
How about forgetting the real world for a while? We miss your literary talents. Why don't you zap us a line? The enforcer may even have mercy on you and not smite you.
THE STORYTELLERS

Belinda,
Be warned! You are not welcome in this town. I will not stand for your embarassing attempts at art. You bring shame to our kind. - Lucina

Hasty Pudding Hoopla

Who Are These Milkmaids & Why Is Chevy Smiling?

Mopsy Strange Kennedy

Even Educated Fleas Do It

Now that Valentine's Day is over, the complicated, often-negative, drenched-in-rue aspects of love, (or more specifically, sex) can be thought about. Richard Gardner, collector of the telling flotsam of culture found in fliers, articles, ads, and self-help courses, has compiled a fascinating book that looks at sex beyond the mere passion. Indeed, if one were to read, on some sex-free distant planet, about the hassles and hurts proliferating out from the core allure of sex, one would have trouble understanding its amazing power to motivate. There are lots of Ann Landers columns here: a wonderfully bitter letter from a husband to his straying wife's lover describing how costly this spoiled woman will be to support, and another from a therapist's wife whose husband was caught with a patient. Comic, self-deprecating things about writing a personals ad, and an Ellen Goodman piece on the sexual moves of divorced mothers show the mere doing-of-it to be problematic. The age-old question of the alleged differences between men and women regarding sex-or-romance is worried and worried again. Nor is anything sex-related congruent or logical: in the same article, we hear blithe mention of Patricia Neal's own affair with the married Gary Cooper alongside her keening over her husband's affair with another woman. Ditto, the contradictions in Jean Paul Sartre and Simone de Beauvoir's relationship with, its reality rather different than its proclaimed mission. Various writers defend the embattled Barney Frank, and the philandering Martin Luther King, and a few scientific tracts bring in the bees and baboon angles. The most directly raw parts of this collection are the sexy-but-also-philosophically-intense comics called "Strips" and the very heavy-hitting illustrated piece by Susie Bright, a pregnant lesbian shown in bondage attire. The wilder shores of love, indeed.

Russia Old And New

In a glass kiosk in a corner of the lobby of the Westin Hotel sits a little slice of Russia — the traditional Russia, the moody, with a strong dose of an exotically fashionable Russia you may not be aware of. A community of emigre artisans living in Brighton produce some of the jewelry which has a flavor of somberly feminine ornateness — the sort of brooches and earrings and necklaces of tiny semi-precious stones you want to stare at, on or off the wearer. And they also sell painted icons, all golden sadness, that manage to be, while of course religious, also attractively decorative as well. The central offerings of this shoplet, though, are the hand-made, one-of-a kind sweaters that begin with natural fibers — angora, silk, cotton, or silk with a sizzle of metallic thread running through-and may add anything from bits of suede to beads to lace or bits of crochet in patches and swatches throughout. These are sweaters, some bright, others pale or dark, that demand an occasion that they would, themselves, ornament theatrically. They cost, accordingly, several hundred dollars. And, on a variation of the famous lacquered nesting dolls, they offer bigger ones that contain their historical seeds within; take off the outer Yeltsin and you find Gorby; the next-smaller one is Brezhnev and then on down to Stalin and finally, Lenin. A great comic gift from $30-$45.

Happy Phone Call To You, Happy Phone Call Tooo Youuu

What to send when your capabilities and intentions lie languishing between a greeting card and an actual hardware-present? You could send a sly comedian's version in humorous phone-form of a greeting call. These droll high-concept entre-actes are the work of local comedians and the brainchild of Comedy Connection's Bill Downes, Frank and Jane Costello who have booked a few. These telephone Birthday Greeting Cards include a very realistic Bill voice, chimed-along-with by a Hillary voice as they nimbly leap along a chain of famous Clintonia ("I would have sent you flowers, but Gennifer and I don't speak any more," says the prez.) They have that chummy co-presidential aura as they touch on health insurance, inhalation, cookies, and the daughter Bill calls "Revere" until corrected. Another greeting is based on an imaginary sadistic game show called "Now You're Old" -- with a chipper emcee glibly alluding to Depends and Walkers (Johnnie) -- and other agedness-items that would be funny for those quite young. And there's a Mafia "card" with the ominous thudding music from the Godfather in the background. A few greetings hold the sarcasm and just let the sweet times roll. The caller gets to review the possible offerings-and then sends it for $5, with instructions as to when it should be dialed in. Infodial will have anniversary and other special occasion greetings as time passes. It's a shockingly easy way to give a present, and fun for the giver too.

Ah, Harvard. The very word conjures up images of lofty academia, studious faces, ivy-covered walls and...men dressed up as milk-maids? Only the Hasty Pudding, one of Harvard's oldest and wackiest societies, could make the Crimson turn pink. Who are these people? And what are they doing to make Chevy Chase smile like that?

HOME TOWN ADVANTAGE

Local Boy Paul Nardizzi Does Good

BY ROSS GARMIL

So, you go out to a comedy club, say Nick's Comedy Stop. The emcee gets up to start off the show. He's pretty funny, you feel ready for a great night. The emcee clears his throat and introduces the first act: "Ladies and Gentleman, Paul Nardizzi."

"Paul Nardizzi?" you say to yourself. "Paul Nardizzi?" you ask the person next to you. "Has he been on 'An Evening at Caroline's Half-Hour Stand-Up Star Search on the Road'?" He shrugs. Well, you applaud anyway, and Paul gets up on stage. You feel somewhat wary. "He doesn't look funny," you think. "He doesn't look funny," you say to the person next to you. He shrugs. Paul begins to speak in a relatively soft voice, with a thick Boston accent. "He doesn't talk funny," you say to the person next to you. "Shut up," he says. And shut up you should, otherwise you'll miss one of Boston's better up-and-coming talents.

Paul Nardizzi may not have the advantage of a nationally-known name or a routine that you would recognize from the many cable comedy shows, but that's part of his appeal. Paul is a Boston comedian. He looks local; he talks local. Hell, he is local. And how do you reach out to a Boston crowd? Start off with Boston material, in Paul's case a routine about Irish Americans and the sobering realities surrounding their culture. "I asked a drunk Irishman if he even knew who St. Patrick was; he said it's the guy on the Lucky Charms box." Of course, as a local comic Paul pronounced it "Lucky Chahm's box."

Paul then moves on to one of his favorite subjects: sports. From his own personal views on the Olympics ("They give out three medals for every event. There's 109 elements out there, why don't we give everybody a little something? You came in eightieth? Here's a big chunk of Boron."), to his advice for the Red Sox and Patriots, to a few topical remarks regarding certain Boston Celtics and certain illegal substances, Paul delivers some of the most entertaining sports commentary in New England.

So now you know a little about his act, but just who is Paul Nardizzi? This 25-year-old stands at 5'9", but doesn't look it. In real life, he is so squarely built that he appears about four inches shorter. Basically, he looks tough. You would not want to meet up with him in a dark alley. Nor would you want to be the subject of his comedy. Paul describes his comedy as "insult humor," and jokes that it tends to lean "more to the negative side." This explains why he feels comfortable talking about the Red Sox, but also helps define the remainder of his routine, aimed not at celebrities, but more at the everyday, commonplace stupidity we encounter in our lives.

The next victim of his soft-spoken rampage is the most annoying, and yet vital, member of every family: the television set. Specifically, Paul attacks the commercials so many of us see all too often, and some shows which make us wish that the commercials would come back on. From razor blade commercials to McDonald's to Oprah, Paul's got something to say about what's wrong on TV.

But we're not going to tell you everything; there are some things in life that you just have to find out for yourself. And with the way Paul Nardazzi works a Boston crowd, you should have ample opportunity to discover the wonder of his comedy for yourself.

Paul Nardazzi will be appearing at Nick's Comedy Stop on April 2&3, and also on April 30 & May 1. ❑

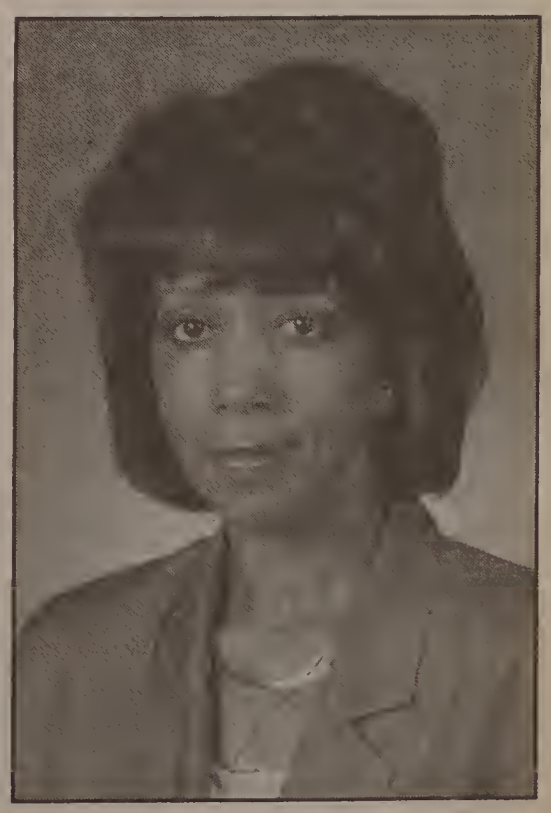
AROUND TOWN

Award-winning writer, director and performance artist Robbie McCauley will be premiering "Turf," a new performance theater work exploring issues of education, race and class relations in Boston. This mixed-media work, which includes 10 Boston area actors, examines the impact of the 1974 court order to desegregate Boston's public schools. "Turf" includes stories, music, slides and video images, dialogue and the words of living witnesses to reflect the range of emotion felt by individuals relating to the 1974 federal mandate and its aftermath. In an effort to keep the presentation of "Turf" close to the various communities it was generated from, The Arts Company is presenting the piece in four neighborhood locations: March 5 and 6 at The Boston Center for the Arts in the South End, March 12 and 13 at the Charlestown Working Theater, March 18 and 19 at the Strand Theater in Dorchester and March 26 and 27 at the South Boston Boys and Girls Club. All tickets are $8. For more information, call 728-1480.



The Wang Center Metropolitans and the Museum of Fine Arts Council, two of Boston's brightest young professional groups, will join together to present an unprecedented evening of creativity and culture. On Friday, March 5, the Copley Plaza Hotel Ballroom will explode with sound as the 1993 "Culture Jam" gets underway. The event begins at 8 PM with contemporary jazz, then a variety of vocalists, dancers, saxophonists and other performers will take the spotlight and up the tempo. At mid-party time, DJ Izzy of Chunky Monkey fame will command stage with his blend of hot dance music. If you don't already know what the Women's Educational and Industrial Union is, listen up. First of all, contrary to their name, they're not an actual union. And although they were formed way back in 1877, by one of America's first female physicians, they still pursue their goal of supporting New England women in a wide variety of ways. They offer advice and career resources for women in career transition. Their retail store offers a variety of often home-made gift items. They hold special events, like the recent February 14 Victorian Bridal Show. If you're interested in learning more about what the WEIU can offer you, try to either attend their 1993 Amelia Earhart Award on Tuesday, March 16 from 6 to 8 PM, awarded this year Deborah Jackson, president and CEO of Morgan Memorial Goodwill Industries (tickets are $35) or one of The Robert D. Hasty Pudding Hoopla or, How a Little Oatmeal Pot Gained National Acclaim.

By Susanne E. Schantz

Chevy Chase stands center stage, a bemused expression flitting across his traditionally deadpan face. A tall man, dressed in a conservative, well-tailored tux, he bestows a tired but benevolent smile on the crew of blond-bewigged men frolicking around him. It is late on this Tuesday night, and everyone looks exhausted, yet exuberant. The champagne is flowing freely all around because, after a year's worth of intense work, the Hasty Pudding Man and Woman of the Year Awards, and opening night of this year's production "Romancing the Throne," are over.

So how exactly did this rag-tag group of nervous Harvardites manage to pull a star of Chase's magnitude to attend their theatrical satire, and grace their history-worn stage? Not to mention Whoopi Goldberg, who dominated the very same platform one week before. They did it the same way the Class of 1967 pulled in Lauren Bacall and Bob Hope, the Class of 1984 got Sean Connery and Joan Rivers and, last year's crew nailed Michael Douglas and Jodie Foster. They used The Two H's: Harvard and history.

The first part is easy: Harvard's national fame and recognition need no further explanation. But there are other ancient social groups at Harvard: the Porcellian, for one, and the Phi Beta Kappa. What gives the Hasty such caché over these other, distinguished organizations?

Pudding and pantyhose.

This is where the history/explanation part comes in. It all harks back to September 8, 1795, when a "secret" society was formed by a group of wayward Juniors, for the mawkish-sounding purpose of "cultivat(ing) the social affections and cherish(ing) the feelings of friendship and patriotism." All mush aside, the Pudding started out as a quasi-serious club, quickly creating their very own constitution (based very loosely on the founding father's version, written a mere eight years before).

Thanks to the almost anally meticulous record-keeping of Harvard College, a copious amount of notes from the very earliest Pudding meeting are still around, written by the likes of then-club secretaries James Russel Lowell and Theodore Roosevelt. These crates of notes give testament to the literary youth of the club, and show a world where poets orated personally-crafted poetry, celebrations were planned and, of course, pudding was consumed. Actually the pudding, namesake of the club, was even written into their club charter: "Two members," it reads, "selected in alphabetical order, should provide a pot of Hasty Pudding for every meeting."

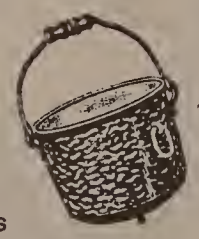
Today, the idea of 20-year-olds sitting around, reading poems and eating oatmeal may seem a little unlikely. But, like every enduring organization, the Pudding has kept up with the times. Today, the Pudding crew still hangs out in the fraternity-style Members Room, complete with requisite pool table, Salvation Army-issue sofas and faded chairs, but today's Puddings are a '90s lot. You're just as likely to see a fashion magazine as a literary journal lying on the coffee tables, and the dress code has changed from formal to way casual. And, unlike the organization's early days, there are female Puddings, now.

But a lot of the underlying Pudding tenants haven't changed. Such as the annual Theatricals, although even those didn't first occur until December 13, 1844. The plays were born when one inspired senior, Lemauel Hayward, arranged a surprise performance of Bombastes Furioso, which was to be performed in his Hollis Hall dorm room. Since the Pudding had no female members at that time, the role of Distaffina, the play's heroine, was performed by member Augustus Hinchman. (Women weren't actually allowed in the club until after it had been requisitioned in 1943 as an Officer's Club for the Navy, and even then, it wasn't female students, but officers' wives that graced the place.)

Hayward's description of that first event pretty well sums it up: "The play went off splendidly – Distaffina wore a low neck and short sleeves, and on her introducing a fancy dance, the applause almost shook old Hollis down." Needless to say, the delighted Puddings decided to do it again. And again.

Tanya Fenmore, sophmore and student publicist for the Pudding, explains how the history of the Theatricals are still the reason for the events' continued success. "You take these very contemporary college students," she explains, "people that are into musical theater, but also jocks and football players, and they all come together with this one goal of putting on this Harvard highlight in four weeks or less. The show's so special," she continues, "because yes, it has 90s contemporary students, but it also has the tradition. That's what really makes the show bond, and stick together, and it's what people are coming to see."

It also helps, continuity-wise, that all the Pudding performances seem to follow a set pattern. All shows were, and still are, musical comedies with big choruses and lots of dancing, jokes about Boston society, costumes, wigs and exaggerated scenery. And the heroine, as one Harvard Alumni Bulletin put it, "always has a baritone voice."



"We still have something called the pun run (a running series of puns on one topic) and the kick line where everyone's in drag," Fenmore says. "These kids from the '90s are still doing the same thing they did in the 19th Century."

By 1882, the ambitious Crimsonites were not only writing their own plays, but performing them before an appreciative public. It's not hard to imagine the plays currently put on at the Pudding being performed before that same, whooping Hollis crowd back in 1844. Only the subject matters have really changed.

As far as Hasty Pudding events, however, much has changed since the early days. In the beginning, annual dinners were the only affairs held at the club, and they were far from the galas they are today. Pudding, of course, would be the staple, and poets, such as Oliver Wendell Holmes, would be invited to write and read an Ode.

Today, as any self-respecting Bostonian knows, the Hasty Pudding Man and Woman of the Year is a national event. The cost of putting on this show, which started out at $6, today totals up at $250,000 (none of which, by the way, is funded by Harvard itself). And each year, a new crop of bright-eyed, inexperienced Harvard undergrads learns first-hand about the pressures of putting on a national theater presentation.

Once members of the Hasty Pudding Theatricals society left the fold and took off their make-up and wigs, some became, well, famous. For a typically diverse variety of reasons. Like becoming Governor of this fair state, and Herman Munster. A list of some of the Hasty's brightest:

Still out of breath days after the final event, Fenmore explains what the experience feels like. "Once the press releases go out," she says, "the phone doesn't stop ringing. I'm the phone from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m.; I can remember the night before Woman of the Year, which was my moment of most stress. I was a basket case. I remember having organized everything to the last detail, from the parade to the security to the press passes."

Typical to the business, however, just when Fenmore thought she was safe, something went wrong. "We had invited Lady Soul, who sang with Whoopi Goldberg in Sister Act, to come and sing for Whoopi. But something got fouled up, and we couldn't get mics and amps. So," she continues, "we picked up Whoopi at 11:30 at night, and at 2 a.m., the morning before show time, we were scrounging around campus, looking for mics. It worked out, but none of us could breathe through the whole day. And this is all while I'm supposed to be in school."

It doesn't help that the people these students are working with are stars; not just local heroes, but honest-to-God big shots. Like Gertrude Lawrence, who was the first woman honored, back in 1951. And Lauren Bacall, Elizabeth Taylor, Candice Bergen and Cher.

Males haven't been awarded as long; it wasn't until 1967 that the first fellow was allotted a pot (in the Pudding's case, the recipient was Bob Hope, which was considered a huge coup at the time). Since then, actors like Warren Beatty, Sean Connery, Bill Murray and Robin Williams have all been recipients. Imagine; one day, your only pressure in life is passing your Bio. exam. Next day, it's making sure Steve Martin's day goes smoothly. Not exactly small potatoes.

Even for a college senior, it must be hard not to get star struck. "The first people I met were Kevin Costner and Glenn Close," says Scot McMahon, one of the current producers of the Hasty Pudding Theatricals. "It was unusual, suddenly being face to face with these people you usually see on a screen."

"Chevy Chase," he continues, "was a constant piece of comedy in action. It was funny to pick him up at the airport. He got off the plane and started with the one-liners right there. We also had a seminar with him where the whole company asked him questions. He had serious answers for things, but he was very funny. You have to be up pretty early in the morning to pull one over on him. With the roast (part of the Man of the Year ceremony), it was like, whose roasting who up here?"

So back to the original question: how is this small theater group pulling in such big names? "At this point we have a lot of momentum," explains McMahon. "When this all started out, we drew in the first couple of people because it was a novel production, even though the show is actually very old. We're on our 145th show now."

Actually, McMahon explains, the Pudding Pot has become such a popular and media-covered award that some people actually write in, nominating themselves. "We have people write in and say they'd like to be Man or Woman of the Year," he explains, "or they know someone who should be. Someone said Angela Lansbury would be good, which is serious, but we've also had people nominate themselves, or their grandmother. Every year we get one letter from the

Make Your Own Hasty Pudding

So maybe you couldn't get into Harvard. Or you made the Harvard cut, but didn't make the auditions for the Theatricals. Take heart. You can still make your own Hasty Pudding.

Why else do you think the society got started in the first place? According to a 1892 Boston Journal article, the founding documents, written way back in 1795, actually stated that, "Two members, selected in alphabetical order, should provide a pot of Hasty Pudding for every meeting."

So what the hell is Hasty Pudding? On paper, it certainly doesn't sound that appetizing. The Oxford English Dictionary describes it as an English pudding made by stirring flour into boiling milk or water until it reaches the consistency of a thick batter; in some parts, the preparation was similar, but substituted oatmeal for flour.

Apparently the U.S. version of this concoction (which involves cornmeal rather than flour, and is topped by salt and milk or molasses) is inexpensive, wholesome and "palatable." Robert De Niro, Hasty Pudding Man of the Year, circa 1979, even whined about missing out on this weird treat. "I'm having a good time," he said, peering into his award's depths. "However, I'm a little unhappy because there's no pudding inside."

To the loyal Pudding boys, this mush was a stuff of bizarre wonderment. Consider the words penned by would-be Pudding and poet Joel Barlow (1793):

"Thy name is Hasty-Pudding! Thus our sires
Were wont to greet thee fuming from the fires...
Such is thy name, significant and clear,
A name, a sound to every Yankee dear,
But most to me, whose heart and palate chaste
Preserve my pure hereditary taste."

Or check out the ode written by Washington Allston (1799), American Romantic painter and Pudding penman, to the oatmeal chefs:

"With hasty-pudding thou dost fill our bellies,
Pudding more soft & rich than nicest jellies.
With joy & rapture how each brother hops,
When first he puts thy pudding in his chops."

Despite these lyric masterpieces, it is possible that the reason the Crimson boys chose this sticky mixture wasn't because it was such good eating. The aforementioned Boston Journal article also describes an "olde tyme prank," wherein naughty Pudding pranksters would "dispose of all their surplus cornmeal batter on the tops of the posts leading into the college yard."

agent of a down-and-out actor, nominating him or her."

And it's not always easy to decide who, out of so many stars, the Theatricals should chose. "They should have made a lasting and impressive contribution to the world of entertainment," explains McMahon. "It's a lifetime achievement type of thing. Sometimes people turn it down. What happens is we have people who can't make the event because they're shooting a movie or something like that. One of the criteria is you have to come here and accept in Cambridge."

Like any growing organization, changes have to occur from time to time. The Hasty Pudding society is no exception. There was, for instance, the big division of the 1970s, when the Theatricals and the Social Club decided to separate.

"They used to be one and the same organization," says McMahon. "They split in the 70s. The club (which boasts such historical members as John Adams, John Quincy Adams, Franklin D. Roosevelt and John F. Kennedy) is a social group. Basically, they hold parties and have a membership list and things like that.

"The Theatrical," he continues, "are just concerned with putting on the show. We're really separate, but it's a mutually beneficial thing. A lot of people who are in the Theatricals are in the club. The club benefits because the officers get to meet the men and women of the year. And if you've been in the Theatricals for two years, they can automatically join the club."

To someone not in the Theatricals, however, there are stipulations to getting access to membership. "You have to be 'punched'," says McMahon, referring to a version of being "tapped" for membership. "You have to be asked to join (the club). It really depends on you knowing someone who's in the club now. They are limited to a number of members."

Despite all the big changes that have happened since the days Puddings sat around chugging oatmeal, the founding members would be reassured to note that today's Puddings still consider some of the old stories the best. Like the one about the 1919 Theatricals show, called "Crowns and Clowns."

"It was a spoof on the Russian Revolution," says Mc - Mahon. "Apparently, there was a group of communists here in the States that heard we were making fun of the whole thing, and they sent in a threat; you know, cut letters from a magazine pasted onto a paper. It said, like, 'Beware, don't do this show or you will be damn sorry,' with a big black hand painted in the middle of the page (representing) some group called The Society."

What did they do? McMahon sounds proud as he said, "Of course, they did the show and the building's still here, so..."

The current Theatricals presentation, "Romancing the Throne," runs at the Hasty Pudding Theatre until March 23. After that, the show hits the road, zooming for a whirlwind two-day tour of the Big Apple, at the at Pace University theater on March 26 and 27, then onto a Spring Break-length performance in beautiful Bermuda. What actor could ask for a better run?

There's a Wealth of St. Patrick's Day Events to Enjoy!

GET UP YOUR IRISH!

By Kathy Matheson

What?! You mean you didn't get invited to State Senate President William Bulger's annual St. Patrick's Day breakfast? What are you, a common taxpayer or something?

Some people will tell you that all the state employees get March 17 off because of something called "Evacuation Day" - the day the British army was forced to flee Bunker Hill during the Revolutionary War. Oh, come now. How many city hall clerks do you think you'll see paying homage to the colonial militia by climbing those steps at the Bunker Hill monument in Charlestown? They're only kidding themselves if they think we don't know they're feasting on corned beef and cabbage, washing it down with, what else, some green beer.

Well, if you're one of those - horrors! - private sector workers who don't get the day off, take heart. There are still ways you can celebrate this most Irish of all Irish holidays, especially since the main event - the St. Patrick's Day parade - actually takes place on Sunday, March 14.

But before we get to the parade, try stopping in at the "Medieval University and Faire" at Harvard on March 13. For only $3, you can transport yourself from 1993 in Cambridge, Massachusetts to 1193 in Cambridge, England. At Memorial Hall and Sanders Theatre, you can see medieval combat and craft demonstrations, as well as a medieval marketplace, complete with dancers, musicians and storytellers. Call 496-2222 for more information.

The next day, get up your Irish! Celebrate Irish-American pride at the annual South Boston parade, which winds down Broadway starting at 1 pm. Be sure to get there early if you even want a chance at seeing the bands and stuff.

The Chieftains, the Irish band of world-repute that have garnered an international following for their Celtic music, perform at Symphony Hall on March 14, at 8 pm. Although they have played with artists such as Emmylou Harris, Van Morrison, Jackson Browne and Elvis Costello, that night they will be joined by the Belfast Harp Orchestra and step-dancer Kelly Anne O'Sullivan. Call 266-1492 for ticket information.

If you're planning to host an all-out bash at your house or apartment, it might be a good idea to go to a cooking seminar called "Party Food" at Boston University. Cookbook author, syndicated columnist and teacher Barbara Kafka leads demonstrations on how to make fun, easy and inexpensive knoshing food The seminar takes place on March 16, at 6 pm. The fee is $60; call 353-9852 to register.

Elvis Costello and the Brodsky Quartet play one of only four U.S. dates right here in Boston on Shamrock Day itself, March 17. Britain's oh-so-mellowed angry young man recorded his new album, "The Juliet Letters," with this string ensemble and will perform at 8:30 pm at Symphony Hall. Don't look for him to play classics like The Angels Wanna Wear My Red Shoes, Oliver's Army or Radio Radio, but naturally it will be a great concert.

And then, of course, there are the bars. Granted, most watering holes will be decorated from head-to-toe in green streamers and shamrock paraphernalia, and no doubt they'll serve green beer. However, there are some traditional Irish pubs where the enjoyment is in the native clientele and the atmosphere. Even though they'll probably have green beer, too. Here is a partial list of Irish haunts worth catching, broken down by area:

• Allston/Brighton: O'Brien's, Kinvara and the Allston Ale House on Harvard Avenue are all winners; The Kells right around the corner on Brighton Avenue is the new kid and the Green Briar in Brighton on Washington Street is a good bet for a good time.

• Boston: The Purple Shamrock on Union Street next to Faneuil Hall; The Black Rose at the foot of State Street; The Claddagh on Columbus Avenue in the South End; Crossroads, at the corner of Beacon Street and Mass. Ave. at the edge of the Back Bay; Mr. Dooley's on Broad Street; The Sevens on Charles Street in Beacon Hill (OK, so it's not all that Irish, but it's still a great bar); and that favorite of the state politicians, J.J. Foley's on Kingston Street just outside of Downtown Crossing.

• Brookline: Corrib Pub on Harvard Street; the Tam o' Shanter and O'Leary's, both on Beacon Street.

• Cambridge: The Black Rose (yes, there's another one!) on Church Street, and the Plough and Stars on Mass. Avenue.

And, if your hangover has worn off and you're still in the mood 10 days later, the Jamaica Plain Arts Center, 659 Centre St., hosts the Gloucester Hornpipe and Clog Society on March 27 at 8 pm. How could anyone resist?

FLICKS IN A FLASH

Groundhog Day

"Funny, time after time"

This is a classic Harold Ramis film, despite the odds against a film based on repetition being anything but annoying. Bill Murray gives a vintage performance as weatherman Phil Connors, a man stuck in time and in Punxsutawney, Pennsylvania. Andie MacDowell (under-used as Connors' new station producer) and Chris Elliott (as cameraman Larry) add to the comedic mix as Connors finds himself forced to deal with the same situations, people and television shows over, and over, and over again. T.S.L.

Lorenzo's Oil

"A Brave and Daring Brew"

Based on the lives of Augusto and Michaela Odone, Lorenzo's Oil is the story of a couple's efforts to save the life of their son from adrenoleukodystrophy (ALD). In this gritty, painful and brilliant picture, the parents (Nick Nolte and Susan Sarandon) not only push the medical establishment for answers, but take up ALD research on their own. While keeping their marriage and their son alive. Nolte's Italian accent is annoying for a while, but it is the only false note in an otherwise important film about the power of determination in the face of helplessness. B.C.

Love Field

"On Shaky Ground"

Love Field is a modest tale surrounding two separate journeys that merge into one. Michelle Pfieffer does a good, albeit shrill, job as Lurene Hallett, the Southern housewife on a bus pilgrimage to J.F.K.'s funeral. On her trip she meets, and becomes involved with Paul Cater (played superbly by Brian Kerwin), a quiet black man traveling with an abused orphan he is attempting to save. Small but powerful moments of racial drama almost make this film great, but its insistence at attempted "big screen" moments make it a toss-up. A.L.

Scent of A Woman

"Pacino Reeks of Hoffman"

A blind, grouchy, former military officer (Pacino) takes his new prep school "babysitter" (Chris O'Donnell) on a Thanksgiving weekend extravaganza in New York City. While the youth frets for Pacino's safety (and about his own problems at school), Pacino overtips waiters, dances the Tango and correctly identifies the perfume (not to mention the hair and eye color) of every woman he meets. B.C.

Matinee

A B-Movie That Earns a B-Plus

The scene is Key West, 1962, and the latest B-movie thriller from "Shock Expert" Lawrence Woosley (John Goodman) is coming to town. The timing is perfect: the Cuban Missile Crisis has just begun, and the fear outside the theater mirrors the melodrama inside. Writer Charlie Haas (Gremlins) provides us with a fair enough script, replete with irony, some romance, sentiment, and of course humor. Director Joe Dantre recreates 1962 in excruciating detail. The jokes were best coming from Goodman, but the remaining members of the cast are on the level of The Wonder Years. Matinee tends to overreach itself by trying to fit in romance, drama and comedy in one nostalgiac package, but for entertainment value and laughs, the movie earns a strong B-plus. T.S.L.

Falling Down

A Darkly Comical Urban Nightmare

D-FENS (Michael Douglas), an ordinary man who has gone over the edge is confronted by gang members in "Falling Down"

BY TIM LEMIRE

In the early goings of Falling Down, Michael Douglas' character (John Q. White Guy with starched shirt and pocket protector) sits on a graffitied stone to mend a hole in his shoe. Douglas' bad day is getting worse. Two menacing Latinos accost Douglas and tell him the graffiti says that he's on their turf, punctuating their ultimatum with the F word.

"Well, maybe if it was in f — ing English," Douglas beams back, "I might be able to f — ing understand it."

The scene is a funny one, indicative of the keen balance of drama and black humor in Falling Down, which also stars Barbara Hershey as Douglas' estranged wife, and Robert Duvall as Officer Prendergast. Duvall is a retiring desk jockey who, on his last days as a cop, works to bring in Douglas, who outdoes Bernard Goetz in refusing to be victimized by urban society.

Douglas' character is initially identified by the license plate of his car — D-FENS — which he abandons in a traffic jam at the outset of the film. Saying he just wants to "go home," D-FENS makes his way across L.A., exchanging his briefcase for a duffel bag of guns and forging a path of chaos as his anger at the annoying minutiae of city life — line item budgets, fast food chains and over-priced sodas — boils over.

The script borrows heavily from David Mamet's play Edmond, in which an equally ordinary guy abandons his wife and home and crosses town in search of truth, while having several perilous encounters along the way (mostly with minorities) that reveal the ugliness of American bigotry, violence and urban ruin.

Falling Down is more darkly comical than Edmond, and hence more palatable for the broader cinematic audience.

Falling Down

Warner Brothers
Directed by Joel Schumacher
Starring Michael Douglas
Robert Duvall
Barbara Hershey

Rated R

Human beings cannot bear very much reality — "urban reality," as Falling Down proclaims itself — and so severe drama is cushioned by dark humor.

Barbara Hershey is Beth, who throughout the movie receives phone calls from her ex-husband D-FENS, and although Hershey is given little more to do than fret and furrow her brow over her husband's imminent arrival ("I'm coming home," he tells her, "I am past the point of no return."), her anxiety is visceral, expressed without hysteria, and one feels in Hershey's pleading not only desire for a safe future but a note of longing to redeem her past with her husband.

Robert Duvall is exceptionally controlled and subtle in his portrayal of the unobtrusive and avuncular Officer Prendergast. Thankfully, the makers of Falling Down opted not to make him a grand hero type: a desk jockey who slips into a phone booth and emerges as RoboCop. Duvall's Prendergast is more like Colombo without the Socratic humility, and eminently likable.

Ultimately, the viewer wonders what the moral is to this "tale of urban reality": stay away from geeky white guys on hot days? The more D-FENS is portrayed as a sociopath, the more easily we can dismiss him as a freak of inner city nature, nothing to worry about because he's insane and we are sane; we are in no danger of becoming like him.

Douglas keeps D-FENS' character restrained in his outbursts, and manages to create pathos in his moments of breakdown. Yet when D-FENS strikes out violently, Douglas looks too casual to be normal; he swipes away people as easily as he swipes away an irritant fly at the start of the movie. At times we identify with him, and at other times, we distance ourselves from his obvious psychosis.

Falling Down, while hardly incendiary for its own sake, is sure to inspire discussion and a greater amount of press regarding its treatment of urban issues, racism and violence. It is a film worth seeing — and surely worth considering. ❑

IN CONTROL OF HIS DESTINY

An Interview with John Turturro

If you've seen Barton Fink, then you know John Turturro. If you've seen Miller's Crossing, then you know John Turturro. And after you've seen Mac, which opens March 3, you'll never forget John Turturro. After cameos and supporting roles in films like To Live and Die in L.A., Desperately Seeking Susan, The Color of Money and Do The Right Thing, John Turturro landed the title role both in Barton Fink and again in Mac, where he also makes his directing debut.

Portraying the explosive on-screen personality of a man whose temper rests delicately on a precipitous ledge build of family values and the lure of the American Dream, Mac is truly the vision of a man who's not obsessed, but certainly blessed with a fondness for control. In this film, the severing of family relationships is sometimes even seen as an acceptable solution to inherent problems.

It is with Mac that Turturro has finally achieved a level of moviemaking satisfaction—without having to play Hollywood's advanced game of back-scratching. Blessed with the autonomy to choose his own cast, he has hand-picked a group which includes his real-life wife Katherine Borowitz, who plays his on-screen wife Alice. In Mac, Alice's frankness more than once saves Mac from a certain financial doom.

Set in Queens in the '50s, Mac is loosely based on the lives of Turturro's childhood role models, particularly his father. Though the story line is simple, written around the life of a skilled carpenter named Mac, and his two brothers Vico and Bruno, Turturro gives us a good view into the passion behind Mac's pursuit of the American Dream. Hard decisions, and even more difficult choices between family and career, are exposed in this film, which shows a world depicted often in still-life, but rarely portrayed on film.

"I never saw that particular world depicted in a film before," says Turturro, weary from a non-stop press tour. "It's about people striving to do something real. Having your ups and downs. It started as a play and developed into a screenplay – it finished as a screenplay in 1987. I hadn't really seen that world on film before. If you look in paintings or photography, these artists have tried to capture them [the builders] for years. They're just people that I like. It's vital."

The importance of such a topic is evident not only in Turturro's choice to star in Mac, but also to direct the film; but he did not make the decision without some reservation. After analyzing the demands of the role and the anticipated demands of directing the project, Turturro went ahead and assumed the additional role of director.

"I had done the role before so that's the advantage over a first time person. I know when to shut the engine off and it would have been difficult directing someone else, to be honest."

Turturro made the choice to direct Mac after speaking with several producers whom he was considering, including Nancy Tenenbaum (Sex, Lies, and Videotape) who accepted the position of producer only after several discussions with Turturro.

"I was a big fan of John as an actor," Tenenbaum recalls. "At that meeting, I found him to be amazingly inspiring and passionate, and I felt that no one else but he should direct this film." It comes as no surprise that, given how impressed she was by Turturro, she quickly gave up her role as adviser and came on board as his producer. Tenenbaum was not the only one who suggested to Turturro that he assume the role of director.

"I had originally thought of hiring another director," admits Turturro, "but all of the people I considered were film makers who wrote and directed all their own material. I was encouraged by the film makers I know well, like Spike Lee, Joel and Ethan Coen, and Martin Scorsese, to think about doing it myself. It took me a while, but I realized that it was really my vision that I wanted to see up there."

You won't wonder for too long about which elements belong in a vision of John Turturro's. Some of them – like the generous blocks of time he offers to individual character development, particularly that of Mac's in this picture – set the tone of the film. Turturro gives scenes enough time to develop their own foundation and carry the weight that they deserve. It's obvious that he has spent time ensuring that background characters and their accompanying noise levels were played to perfection. In Mac, scenes which included his mother's moans and wails couldn't have been more perfectly woven into the more central lines and action at the front of the scene. With Tenenbaum and co-producer Brenda Goodman's deliberate hands-off approach to working with Turturro, this film pulls together with the ease of a project that enjoys – and sets – its own pace.

"I met other directors and producers and wasn't that interested in them," says Turturro. "Nancy asked me to show her a rewrite. She had worked on some interesting films, and never asked me to compromise or water it down. After speaking with other younger directors, I thought, 'I'll do it.' I thought it would be a good test and I wanted to show people what I could do. I feel privileged to have gotten the chance to do it."

It comes as no surprise that Turturro finds it easy to parallel the work ethics of Mac (who wakes his brothers up each morning at the crack of dawn) to his own.

Actor/director John Turturro enjoys a brief moment in Boston's historic North End.

"There are many things that are similar between the two of us. I had the advantage of going to school (Yale School of Drama, where he won the Carol Dye award for excellence in acting), and articulating better, but there are a lot of similarities. Some of his characteristics directly parallel mine, but having heard some of the lines in different ways from different people, you could say that I was inspired by a lot of different sources. But it's more of a parallel of my dad's life."

In some of Mac's scenes, co-stars Michael Badalucco and Carl Capotorto play Mac's semi-committed (to the family business) brothers with such conviction and zest that scenarios flow at a comfortable pace. In fact, Turturro and gang spent several months trying out scenes, editing, rewriting, changing and improvising. "Over a period of months, we'd videotape it and put it in. Michael really improvised a lot and he really caught it on film. We improvised a good amount during rehearsals and then put it into the script."

Whether or not Mac is a commercial success remains to be seen. Turturro refuses to reflect or predict on its popularity, but asserts his position when saying, "I won't be influenced by it." Nor will the decision to direct again be similarly affected. "I'm not looking for a director's job [laughs], but if I do direct again, I hope it's something that will be as motivating as this."

Mac opens Wednesday, March 3. ❑

When Irish Eyes are Collecting

Master Paintings from The National Gallery of Ireland

BY JENNIFER MCCANN

Straight from the Emerald Isle is an exhibition of 44 European paintings from one of Europe's most prestigious museums. "Master European Paintings from the National Gallery of Ireland: Mantegna to Goya" is the name of the exhibit being featured at the Museum of Fine Arts through March 28.

Spanning four centuries, the exhibit includes paintings created by such renowned artists as Jacques Louis David, Francisco de Goya, Diego de Silva Velazquez and Thomas Gainsborough. The reason for this showing is very straightforward; the National Gallery of Ireland is currently under renovations and, not wanting some of its "most precious masterpieces" to gather sawdust, has sent these works to four American museums, including the MFA.

MASTER EUROPEAN PAINTINGS FROM THE NATIONAL GALLERY OF IRELAND

Museum of Fine Arts
465 Huntington Ave.
Boston
On View Through
March 28, 1993

This extraordinary exhibit begins with a look at paintings from the Renaissance and Baroque periods, covering the 15th, 16th and 17th centuries. Included are portraits by Wolf Huber and Conrad Faber, with works by Diego Velazquez and Claude Lorrain featured in the second gallery. The last two galleries cover the 18th and 19th centuries where artists such as William Hogarth of England, Irish portrait painter Sir Joshua Reynolds and French master Jacques-Louis David are represented.

In addition to this exhibit, a series of lectures has been produced by the MFA to focus on the individual works from the National Gallery of Ireland, on both a personal and a historical level. Dream of the Red Spider

Simplistic and Far From Tantalizing

Alvin Epstein and Jonathan Fried in Dream of the Red Spider

BY NANCY LEONARD

For all its hyperventilation and sexually charged atmosphere, Dream of the Red Spider, in its world premiere at the American Repertory Theatre, is really quite simplistic. Author Ronald Ribman seems to have written a minor allegory about the illusion of power and the randomness of life, which director Ron Daniels has then tried to pump up into a major cinematic affair. But the directorial vision does not equate with mythmaking. We're told the few things we need to know, and shown little more. Despite the earnest philosophic intentions, there's little substance amidst all the decoration.

The play is set in a fictional South American country, in a time of trouble and hardship, with a plague of red spiders on the outskirts of the city. The country appears to be ruled by Luis Gutierrez, El Commandante (played by Jonathan Fried who's wonderful as the slow-witted, mechanized El Commandante), though he is actually a robotic invention of the former revolutionary, Don Emilio Valverde, who is the real strongman behind the throne. Don Emilio -- whose idealistic visions have long since turned to ashes — is an elderly widower, authoritatively commanding his troops through a portable phone while hiding behind the walls of his estate — safe from assassins aiming at his creation. Alvin Epstein, who plays Valverde, captures his torment, if not his power.

Meanwhile, in what seems a separate matter from the nature of ruling power, a malevolent minor official named Uyttersprot is planning betrayal. He plucked a young girl from a fish plant, transformed her into a nightclub entertainer, and sent her into the arms of Don Emilio. Violet seduces the old man with sex and the dream of restored youth, setting him up for destruction.

In the final scene, placed in a kind of existential void, Uyttersprot confides that an accident set him on his course. He hoped that with his evil deed, God would appear and explain why a runaway cow trampled his pregnant wife. The only appearance, though, is by Gutierrez, who is prepared to assume real power, thinking he's a real person now that his creator is gone.

Ribman intended this work to explore the human desire for "certainty" in public and private matters. But his play is innaccurately dramatized. He spends too much time on some things — drawing the romance out to excessive length, and lingering at the Carnival celebration — and needlessly portrays what we've already been told. He also slights important matters, and keeps a good deal obscure until the very end. It's disappointing, but somehow not a surprise, to learn that despite an army of fumigators, the spiders are purely metaphorical. Mostly, the playwright needs to make the connection between Don Emilio and his creation much more forcefully at the outset, so that we get a feeling of tyranny in the land and of Gutierrez's own ambitions. Right now, Don Emilio's fall hardly resonates, because we have no sense of his pivotal role.

The direction adds a dark energy and tacky gloss to the proceedings, particularly when it focuses on Violet's tarty mission. The first act seems like a soap opera with intellectual pretensions: the artsy staging standing for substance and portentousness. The second act contains an indulgently erotic Carnival scene, with lots of frenzied commotion, glittery beasts of burden, and a looming neon-lighted spider that's ill used in the action. The black void, with Don Emilio ignominiously suspended in a burlap sling, is born in chaos, then imagined dimly as a luggage storeroom, starkly lit from various angles. Ominous rumblings fill the air throughout the action.

There's a cinematic sensibility to the production design, as it moves through the very different settings, for example, from the silvery, subterranean nightclub to the sun-drenched estate with its yellow walls and wilted palm. The design team -- Riccardo Hernandez (sets), Catherine Zuber (costumes), Frances Aronson (lighting), Maribeth Back (sound) — certainly played a strong role in establishing the atmosphere. But the collective artistry all seems externally imposed. The feverish, large-scale vision adds little and outdistances the material. The two plot-like themes remain small and transparent amidst the embellishment, never working their way up to myth or even much intellectual challenge.

The additional performers, locked into the surreal action, conduct themselves with skillful authority. Black-garbed Jack Willis is grandly enacing, then nearly sympathetic, as Uyttersprot. Maggie Rush plays Violet with bold seductiveness and annoying self-interest (and just a whiff of hesitancy in the characterization). Remo Airaldi and Candy Buckley are funny as "loyal" military confidantes, and the latter has a stand-out turn in the Carnival frenzy. Though Ribman would be faulted for being too obscure, his concerns in Dream of the Red Spider may be overly apparent. In any event, his allegory seems small-scale and far from tantalizing in the hyperbolic ART production. Perhaps Daniels, like El Commandante, had his own agenda. ❑

Letter From The Editor

To our readers,

In the two year period I've been with The Improper Bostonian, I have witnessed many changes here at the paper.

We began with a small staff (five to be exact), and have grown to the numbers currently reflected in our masthead. Our circulation has grown, our coverage has expanded and most importantly, our readership has increased and remained loyal. You have supported The Improper Bostonian in a time of economic uncertainty — a time in which we have relied on your support and feedback, for which I have been unquestionably grateful. When Mark Semonian, our publisher and friend, committed to bringing Boston an alternative to its current selection of entertainment magazines, I was eager to be one of the first to hop on board. Mark — and our staff — all began, with an uphill battle to plough through the recession while making a name for ourselves in Boston. This fight still goes on, but with each day and each new issue, we are making progress.

It is this thought of progress and the absence of daily contact with our staff that I will miss the most when I move on to the West Coast where I have accepted a new position. The paper will continue to flourish, the staff will remain and I hope that you, the reader will continue to support The Improper Bostonian for years and years. And while you're reading, I will be occasionally reflecting and sometimes lamenting on my time with the paper — a time which has brought plenty of joy, some hair-greying frustrations and of course a good share of crazy times.
Sure, there will soon come a time when I'll be relaxing in my new home, missing those special memories — like Underwear Day (our staff parades around in nothing but underwear every Thursday). But what this editor leaves behind more than anything else is a family filled with the most creative people he's ever met. Best of luck to the staff of The Improper Bostonian and you, the Improper reader.

DAVID'S

An Eclectic Tour of Europe

BY R.E. BRUNSON

To step into David's is to step into another world. This new restaurant, at the location of the former Bnu, has a European flair with overtones of the Spanish surreal. The graceful wrought-iron tables and chairs, red and orange walls, and three stage-like facades provide an almost theatrical setting for the imaginative interpretation of cuisines from around the Mediterranean. The menu is divided into selections of Tapas, First Courses, Pastas, and Main Courses. Several specials are also available nightly.

To begin our Mediterranean adventure, we started with Spain and a 1990 Rioja Reserva wine ($19). Our journey continued to Provence with the Pistou soup ($4) and Fried Chicken Livers with Red Pepper Aioli (a special, $3.50), then on to Italy with David's Antipasto for Two ($11.50). The chicken livers soon appeared – brown and crispy outside, tender and pink inside, sitting on a silken pool of red pepper aioli (garlic mayonnaise). In a blink, they were gone. The Pistou soup was filled with fresh zucchini, carrots, leeks and white beans. It was finished in the traditional way with pistou, a basil mixture similar to pesto, and grated parmesan cheese. The homemade soup was pleasant but bland and should have been heartier. The antipasto for two (which could have satisfied three) arrived on a white plate covered with crisp romaine lettuce and a delicious selection of antipasti that included thick slices of prosciutto di Parma, marinated mussels, tender artichoke hearts, gorgonzola cheese, roasted peppers and grilled flatbreads.

For main courses, we stayed in France and ordered Bouillabaisse Rosco (market price $21.95), the Roast Garlic-Glazed Chicken ($15), and the Roast Fennel-Crusted Monkfish ($14.50). The bouillabaisse, a classic dish from southern France, arrived in an oversized bowl brimming with a hearty tomato saffron broth and chunks of tender monkfish, shrimp, calamari, and a lobster tail. In the center of the bowl stood a collection of mussels with a large lobster claw dramatically perched in the middle. On the side were two large croutons spread with the traditional hot rouille sauce. The dish was delicious and almost too large to finish.

The roast garlic-glazed chicken was also very pleasing with its outer coating of pureed garlic. It was very tender and surprisingly juicy with a fragrant garlic flavor that went all the way to the bone; the garlic lovers at the table went wild. It was accompanied by crisp French-style green beans and two oven-roasted farci. For the farci, two slightly carmelized onions were filled with a mixture of rice, parmesan cheese, onions and red peppers – a tasty compliment to the garlic.

Rounding out the trio of main courses was the Roast Fennel-Crusted Monkfish. The monkfish, a meaty whitefish, was covered in roasted fennel seeds, sliced into medallions and arranged on an exotic tasting honey saffron sauce. The dish also came with the red pepper aioli for the less adventurous and was accompanied by warm red potatoes in a vinaigrette with chopped red peppers. Our tour not quite over, we turned our attention to dessert.

Bypassing the selection of after-dinner coffees and wines, we made a dessert side-trip to the States for David's Devil's Food Cake ($5) and ended up in Italy for the apple and apricot crostada (a special, $5). The triple layer chocolate cake was almost five inches tall, so tall that the mound of whipped cream beside it seemed to be there to hold it up. The cake itself was dense, moist, and tangy (made with buttermilk) and covered with a smooth chocolate frosting – an American influence that was greatly appreciated. However, as much as the cake was loved, the crostada had star quality and received a nomination for dessert of the year from one member of the party. The simple rustic-looking tart was placed on a cloud of brown sugar marscapone, and drizzled with an orange scented caramel sauce. We ordered seconds and would have ordered thirds, if there had been room. After the last bite, we found ourselves already planning the itinerary for our next trip to David's. ❑

Michael Shaps, the winemaker and general manager of the winery, will be pouring four of Mellea's vintages , including the 1991 Vidal Blanc and the 1989 Royal Oak. Juicy Details

This has been a hot calendar week for restaurant openings. The Fishery, in Central Square, Cambridge opened on Wednesday night, Whiskey's, formerly Hunter's, has opened at 885 Boylston St. in Back Bay. Venetian Gardens has opened in Dorchester. Giuffre's has reopened under new management in the North End. And, finally, the opening of Cornucopia on the Wharf was held Tuesday. The Park Square Building is accepting bids for space in its complex, and word has it that two restaurants, one a high-scale Italian restaurant in Coolidge Corner (rhymes with Lorenzo), and the other a fairly well-known brewhouse (no clues on this one). Also, it has been brought to our attention that Joe Pesci, having read the Improper's review of Trattoria Il Panino in the North End, has been spotted there on several occasions over the weekend. Embarrassing Moments: Rumor has it that a certain local columnist was caught mooning Julia Child and company at a recent fundraiser for the AIWF. ❑

In Vino Veritas: Boston Wine Expo Debrief

BY JONATHON ALSOP

What a relief last month's Boston Wine Expo was! In the absolute dead of winter, the sight of some 6,000 wine lovers lined up to show a little spirit made me momentarily hopeful for Boston's wine culture. Then again, maybe it was just a result of the 373 different wines I tasted.

For me, the high point of the Wine Expo was our dinner Friday night with Larry McCulloch, wine maker from Chamard Vineyards in Clinton, Connecticut, and his wife Jill, who handles Chamard's marketing. Larry and Jill brought their wines, and I made dinner: bread and cheese, sautéed portabella mushrooms and a monster London Broil au poivre. Should you get the chance, here are some ideas about Chamard's wines:

• '90 Chamard Suffolk County Chardonnay, $9: nice nose of fresh fruit, some butter and spice, excellent tropical fruit flavors, rich and tasty, very friendly and easy

• '90 Estate Reserve Chardonnay, $11: bright golden color, aromas of super-ripe pears and apples, rich and smooth fruit with deep mineral flavors like a good French Chablis, excellent; available from the winery.

• '88 Pinot Noir, $10: bright ruby color, nose of earth and cherries, black raspberry flavors with lots of spice, light in alcohol, very good on its own but an amazing match with the portabella mushrooms. However, this is a limited release, and therefore no longer available retail.

• '89 Estate Reserve Cabernet Sauvignon, $13: bright purple color, lively fresh fruit nose, simple tannins, juicy, spicy, very enjoyable but not of the same epic proportions as the '88 that followed. This was a limited release, and is also no longer available retail.

• '88 Estate Reserve Cabernet Sauvignon, $13: an astounding wine, dense and opaque, aromas of dried fruit, blackberry and currants, beautiful soft tannins, layers

Tastings Around Town

• Brookline Liquor Mart, Allston: Saturdays 2-4 pm and Tuesdays 5:30-7 pm. 3/6 & 3/9: "Varietal Series: Pinot Noir," a blind tasting with $12 and $50 PNs side-by-side, often a lesson in blind humility. 3/13 & 3/16: "New Rhones," an outstanding tasting of '90 Chateauneuf-du-Pape and '89 Guigal Cote Rotie and Hermitage, absolutely not to be missed.

• Blanchard's in Allston: tastings every Friday 5-8 pm and every Saturday 2-5 pm.

• Winecellar of Silene, Copley and Waltham: Fridays 4-6:30 pm and Saturdays 2-4:30 pm.

• Marty's in Allston: Saturdays 1-3 pm.

• Bauer on Newbury Street: Saturdays 4-7 pm.

• Kappy's in Sudbury and Mall Wines at Fresh Pond in Cambridge: Saturdays noon-6 pm. • Chestnut Hill Wine Cellar, in the old Chestnut Hill Mall by Star Market: every Saturday, 4-6 pm.

Elvis Goes Irish

Costello Breaks Classical Ground With The Juliet Letters

BY SANDER WOLF

Classic Costello - Elvis with The Brodsky Quartet

"There's so many people to see/So many people you can check up on and add to your collection," sang Elvis Costello in his 1978 break-through song, "Accidents Will Happen." Now, in 1993, Costello has taken that philosophy one step further by substituting "musical styles" for "people." The Juliet Letters (Warner Brothers), his new album recorded and co-written with the Brodsky Quartet, is nothing more than a document proving that Costello has augmented his vast collection with yet another form of musical expression.

Of course, as most fans know, new musical adventures are not so novel for Costello. 1991's Mighty Like A Rose featured the Dirty Dozen Brass Band fleshing out his jazz tunes, 1986's King Of America found Costello playing blues, his 1977 debut album, My Aim Is True, had obvious Buddy Holly roots, and he's even released an album of country covers entitled, Almost Blue. For the most part, however, Costello tends to stick to his own post-punk, alternative-pop hybrid. It's that formula that has brought him his biggest successes, with songs like "Alison," "Pump It Up," "Everyday I Write The Book," and "Veronica." But after the dismal (and deserved) semi-failure of 1991's Mighty Like A Rose, a new direction, or at least diversion, is a welcome and justified progression.

And a diversion is exactly what The Juliet Letters is. It's definitely different, and for more than just the obvious stylistic reasons. First of all, it's a concept album. Costello has previously released albums with vague themes attached, most notably Spike, Armed Forces and King Of America, but he has never adopted an idea so completely. Loosely based – as the liner notes explain – around "this professor in Verona who answered letters addressed to Juliet," The Juliet Letters follows through by extending the premise to the point where the album contains only songs that take the form of different types of correspondence. The topics and forms include junk mail, letters of rejection and graffiti scribbled on a wall (to name a few), but most stick closely to the concept of letters, written without the expectation of a reply.

Second, a majority of the songs (or since this is "classical music," maybe they should be referred to as pieces?) are co-written by Costello and members of the quartet. Costello has had some writing partners in the past (including Paul McCartney, Nick Lowe, Clive Langer and his wife, former Pogue, Cait O'Riordan), but none of them were an integral part of an album, and most of the collaborations were only for a couple of isolated songs. On The Juliet Letters, it's as if Costello has formed a new "band," with Michael Thomas and Ian Belton on violins, Paul Cassidy on viola, Jacqueline Thomas on cello and himself spitting out his trademark vocals.

Performed live in the studio, the album is initially breathtaking for its sonic power alone (especially for those expecting some angry electric guitar), which is probably why the brief introduction, "Deliver Us?" is an instrumental. The album's extensive liner notes (written by Costello) give some insights into how the band worked together and what each song was written about, so a lengthy discussion here wouldn't make much sense (and it would make even less to disagree with the songs' writers). There are some songs, however, that deserve specific mention.

"I Almost Had A Weakness," with its tango phrasing and tempo is one of these. Written as an "eccentric aunt's curt reply to a begging letter," the song accurately captures the aunt's fury and regret about almost giving in with lyrics like, "Thank you for the flowers/I threw them on the fire/And I burned the photographs that you had enclosed/GOD they were ugly children/So you're the little bastard of that brother of mine/Trying to trick a poor old woman/'Til I almost had a weakness."

Another standout from the twenty-song album is "Jacksons, Monk, And Rowe." Lines like, "As the sun beats down and life begins to complicate/Will we both incinerate/If we touch that brass name-plate?" decorate the song with the disillusionment perpetrated by the firm named in the title, while the strings provide an able and hum-able hook.

The album's lightest moment comes on the song "This Offer Is Unrepeatable." With laundry-list lyrics from the Beloved Entertainer it winds away like the mailed equivalent of "Crazy Eddie's" ridiculous advertisements, performed in the style of some sort of twisted opera. "Taking My Life In Your Hands" is constructed in a more tragic vein, telling the story of a person who has created a fantasy-life by mailing letters to a fictitious love that return unopened. Here, where the melancholic power of strings can really step to the forefront, the Brodsky Quartet makes full use of the opportunity, soaring through the song with easy grace.

The only problem with the album is that while both the Brodsky Quartet and Elvis Costello are in top form, the combination subtly dilutes the power each would have had individually. It's a delicate, debatable balance between what the album is and what it could have been, but as a whole it suits its purpose. Silencing naysayers, The Juliet Letters is another brave, collectable adventure for Costello that proves he hasn't given up, or even slowed down. ❑

Elvis Costello and the Brodsky Quartet perform March 17 at Symphony Hall.

Classical Preview

BY PETER CATALANO

Wuthering Heights is coming to Boston March 10th, 12th, 14th and 16th. No, it's not the Bronte novel, but Carlisle Floyd's opera version, which has been missing from the stage for almost 20 years. Floyd himself is directing this production, with lyric opera music director Stephen Lord conducting the entire debut cast. Tickets range from $28-$60 and reserving seats is easy: simply call the ticket office at 248-8660 and use your credit card. Several dinners, cast parties and special events – including a screening of the 1939 film version of Wuthering Heights with Laurence Olivier – have been arranged around these performances, starting March 4. Call the Lyric for more details.

Meanwhile, Benjamin Zander and his Boston Philharmonic showcase pianist Robert Levin are performing Mozart's last concerto on Saturday night, March 6 at 8 pm in Jordan Hall, and Sunday, March 7 at 4 pm, Sanders Theatre, Harvard. Levin has distinguished himself as the only musician around who can improvise the candenzas of these concerti, cadenzas which performers in Mozart's day were expected to do as a matter of course. Not even Keith Jarrett has the chops to improvise this way in public. Tickets are a bargain and can be reserved by calling 861-8530.

Talbot's clothiers has joined up with the Bank of Boston Celebrity Series for their presentation of emerging artists in the area. Current shows include soprano Lorraine Hunt in recital at Jordan Hall on Sunday, March 14, 8 pm. If you've never attended a recital by a top vocalist like Hunt, take advantage of this opportunity to hear her in the intimacy of Jordan Hall; there'll be lots of dreamy French romantic music. Call the Celebrity Series for reservations at 482-2595. ❑

KEITH RICHARDS

Rockin' The Road With The Winos In Tow

BY POLLY CAMPBELL

Slamming off the opening chords to Eddie Cochran's "Something Else" at the first of his three Orpheum shows last month, Keith Richards seemed strangely within reach; not so much an international rock star and guitar hero, but more like a man who, after thirty years, is still completely in love with what is simply classic rock 'n' roll. Just as the uncomplicated riffs he and The Stones originally took from Robert Johnson and Chuck Berry sounded true even though they were borrowed, it hardly matters now that many of the songs on Richards' third solo album – Main Offender (Virgin) - are slacker re-writes of the best moments on '88's tension-driven Talk Is Cheap. The songs themselves may not be timeless, but the torn and frayed sound of his voice and guitar are, and, with Richards, that's what matters.

At the Orpheum, what mattered was Richards and his guitar and those songs. There were no props; the only backdrop was the X-pensive Winos, who, despite their sterling playing and Richards' obvious inclusion of them as equals, hung back like a well-taught back-up band. Only veteran Stones "sidemen" sax player Bobby Keys and vibrant back-up singer Sarah Dash really sparked any of their own personalities off Richards', and this was more due to his obvious affection for them (singing "Time Is On My Side" with his arm around Dash, hauling the fleeing Keys back onstage to be introduced) than to any effort of their own.

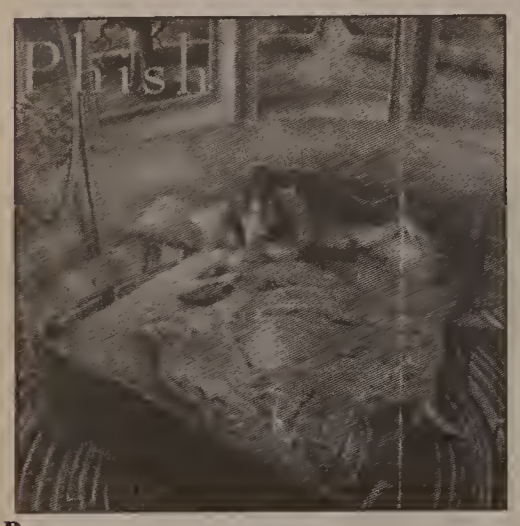
The two hour set rolled by to the solid mid-tempo pound of the Winos, combind with the huge, authentically basic grind of Richards' guitar. The same spare riff-rhythms all ran through "Hate It When You Leave," "Wicked As It Seems," "999" and "Runnin' Too Deep" – and who would want to vary them when they form the foundation for so much of what is standard in rock 'n' roll today. The only low points were "Words Of Wonder," which Richards dragged out far too long on a phony reggae back-beat, "Gimmie Shelter" and "Time Is On My Side." These two Stones classics should have been show-stoppers, but were made sluggish by slow tempos and Dash's voice – brilliant, but at times over-poweringly perfect in contrast to Richards' stubble-chinned growl.

Still crankin' after all these years

Although he grinned through much of the show, up close it was painfully clear that time hadn't been on Keith Richards' side for quite a while; seeing this small frail man, with the line-worn face of an amiable Frankenstein was distracting. But stepping back far enough to ignore visual reminders that Richards is a guy who has never said no to anything, what remained was the way he moved with his guitar; jabbing up with his right elbow to rip into a chord, kicking his right leg back to swing the neck forwards. Small moves, nothing showy, every movement focused on gathering wood, steel and electricity into the backbone of a sound that time can't touch.

Towards the end of the show, the Winos kicked up their heels a little, actually managing to sound tough in "I Could Have Stood You Up," then plummeting into a glorious, gigantic version of The Stones' "Happy." "God bless you, Boston," shouted Richards, in his only non-mumbled crowd-address of the evening, "We hope to leave you happier than we found you!" Considering the noise made by hundreds of people singing the familiar chorus, Keith Richards and his Winos kept them, and left them just that way.

Openers Soul Asylum had the thankless task of playing to a hall one-third full of this largely suburban audience who, judging from the shouts for "Keith!", hadn't heard of them and didn't want to. However, the band seemed capable of jump-starting from nothing, tearing through "Without A Trace," "Cartoon," and "Runaway Train," Next, they slided smoothly into "Black Gold" (the latest radio song from Grave Dancers Union), at which the audience took its nose out of its collective draft beer cup and sat up and yelled in recognition.



Soul Asylum managed to hang on to their attention for the rest of the set, slash and burning through the Guns 'n Roses-styled "April Fool," with Dave Pirner snaking around behind the mike stand, hair standing up to gravity, displaying more knee than jean. "This song is a joke," he explained. The crowd wasn't so sure. But what really got Keith Richards' fans going was the portion of the Allman Brothers' "Jessica" that guitarist Dan Murphy ingeniously grafted onto the band's own "SomebodyTo Shove." "More!" howled the leather-clad mountain behind me as the lights went up. "Finish it!" ❑

BY POLLY CAMPBELL

Eighteen reasons to wait two weeks before moving somewhere with a shorter winter: on March 3rd the Bon tons roule all over the place when Lousiania boy Zachary Richard brings his zydeco/R&B/All-American groove to Nightstage (9:00 show). Tatooed hard rock pounders, Warrant share some introspective (not) sounds at Axis (openers, Spread Eagle and Slammin Gladys, 8:00 Show). On the 4th, legendary Jazz bassist (and Ella Fitzgerald's ex!), Ray Brown brings his Trio (Benny Green and Jeff Hamilton) to the Regatta Bar for a three night engagement ($10-$14). But if you'd rather just bang your head against the seat infront of you, really fast, you can see industrial metal workers Pantera at the Orpheum with Sacred Reich (7:30 show, $19.50).Or , there's Black 47 doings the celtic/soul/punk thing at the Paradise (18+, all 2/14 tix honored). On the 5th, people's poet, Henry Rollins spews spoken word genius at the Paradise. Hopefully you didn't need me to tell you about it because it's sold out. (7:00 show, 18+, no stage diving!). Later that night, also at the Paradise, pick up your feet to Bim Skala Bim. If you like the name, you'll like the band (10:30 show, 18+). Reconstituted, smoothed-out punk rock survivors Gang of Four are at Axis on the 6th. On the 7th, funk's mad scientist, George Clinton descends on the Providence Performing Arts Center, while over at the Middle East you can see Athens, GA. power-pop trio, Five-Eight with Drunken Boat..At the Green Street Grill on the 8th, members of Mente and the Satantics trade bad taste for good breeding to become idols of the idle rich, Upper Crust. You'll hear songs about servant trouble and love among the pedigrees, you'll laugh so hard you'll forget the recession. Better yet, it's free. On the 11th, rich-toned jazz singer Abbey Lincoln kicks off her first of three nights at the Regatta Bar ($10-$14) and left-of-center pop band Too Much Joy are at the Paradise (8:00 show).On the 11th, Saucer (formerly Big Dipper) play beautiful songs about snowmobiles and giant worms and love and other important things. Openers include ex-Cavedog Mark Rivers' new band, The Crumbs, along with Corndolly and The Mies. It's all upstairs at the Middle East. On the 14th, Daniel Ash (ex-Bauhaus) and his lush, chiseled cheek-boned sound are at the Paradise with Pure (8:00 show, 18+), while jazz revolutionary Charlie Haden makes a rare appearance with his Liberation Music Orchestra at the Somerville Theatre (7:00 show, $10-$14). On the 15th you can hear Suzanne Vega's wispy voice and powerful songs at Axis (openers, Kitchens of Distinction, 8:00 doors, $15). Or, finally, you can pretend you're in New Orleans with the Revolutionary Snake Ensemble brass band at the Green Street Grill. And after all that, who needs the Bahamas? Right?...Right? ❑

PHISH

Phish has come a long way since their early days as a rhythm and blues cover band in Burlington, Vermont. Ten years of touring, promoting and building up a solid cult constituency has fine-tuned these players into a progressively-minded troupe of highly versatile musicians. They are as comfortable with lingering blue-note ballads as they are with sixty mile-an-hour bluegrass, funk jams and jazzy instrumentals. This doesn't, however, guarantee that their studio work is always worth getting excited about. So adept at crossing the lines defining genre and tempo, somehow Phish seems wholly unable, or unwilling, to cross that all-important line between live music and studio musicianship.

The band's latest studio release, Rift – following on the heels of the oh-so-eclectic Picture of Nectar – only serves to reaffirm this fact: it just doesn't capture the soul of the band. Cuts like "Horn" and "Fast Enough For You" show promise as live ventures, but are dulled by the confines of the studio; they lack excitement.

The cult-following Phish has spawned is founded on an appreciation of spontaneity, an element that is disappointingly missing from most of Rift. Harnessing spontaneous energy and channeling it in the studio is no easy task, but Phish – such an ambitious musical outfit otherwise – doesn't even seem to try. With the exception of a couple of fun, campy cuts on Rift, we can, in good conscience, toss this fresh Phish back into the water.

DUKE LEVINE
NOBODY'S HOME
DARING RECORDS

Duke Levine doesn't make it tough for listeners to enjoy his proficient guitar work, and this may be his weakness. There aren't any forays into uncharted musical space, no wild and daring guitar solos, no earth-shaking riffage. What there is on Nobody's Home – his second all-instrumental release with the Duke Levine Group – is steady, technically fluent guitar work, characterized by his signature light, tasteful touch. During his almost twenty years as a serious guitar student, Levine seems to have focused his abilities on technique, rather than innovation. Still, Nobody's Home shows him to be one of the sharpest guitarists in Boston, the definition of a musician's musician.

Nobody's Home is a sampling of what Levine calls "roots fusion" – combining the basic elements of blues, rock, country and soul into an easy-listening package of light rock that, for all its fine-tuned technical effort, lacks much feeling. There are a few signs of life though. Cuts like "Attack of The Mutant Guitars," (featured in the movie Passion Fish's soundtrack) "Stop, Do Not Go," and an inviting cover of Woody Guthrie's "Vigilante Man," do come across with some fervor. But overall, Levine seems to be exchanging pleasantries with his guitar rather than opening up a heated debate and coming up with something really exciting. His obvious talent and extensive road experience with the del Fuegos, Otis Rush and Bob Moses prove that he is capable of much more.

THE THE DUSK
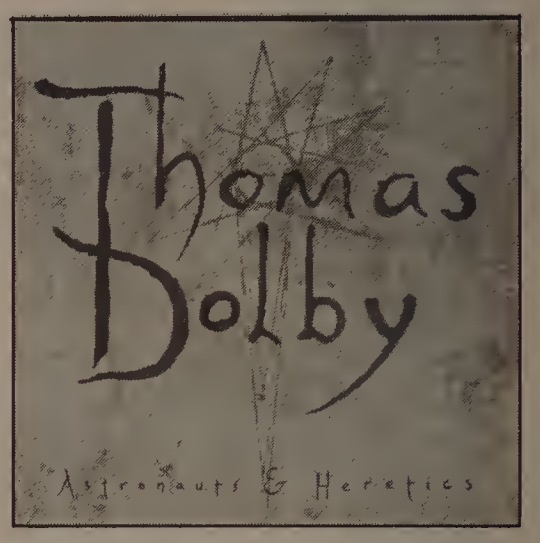
EPIC RECORDS



The hauntingly soothing sounds of The The are once again evident on their latest release, Dusk. Acoustic guitar, harmonica, and the way Matt Johnson's vocals breathe and change tone all combine to create a music that seems to exist in a trance-like state. D.C. Collard's honky-tonk piano is strong in "This Is The Night," while guitarist Johnny Marr brings shades of Jimi Hendrix's "Voodoo Child" to "Sodium Light Baby."

Throughout much of Dusk, Johnson grapples with his favorite subjects: lust, unfulfilled desires, loneliness and wrongs in the world. "I got it blue. I got it bad. I got the sweetest sadness I ever had," he sings in "Dogs of Lust." And although "Slow Emotion Replay" is getting the most airplay at the moment, tracks such as "True Happiness This Way Lies," "Love Is Stronger Than Death" and "Dogs of Lust" are the best. Definitely worth checking out.

THOMAS DOLBY
ASTRONAUTS & HERETICS
GIANT RECORDS

What may be more important than the songs on Dolby's new album are the musicians that contributed to it, and the way in which their playing was recorded. The album features bizarre, but well-placed guest appearances by Eddie Van Halen, Bob Weir, Jerry Garcia, Ofra Haza, Eddi Reader, Leland Sklar, and Budgie, all precisely recorded direct to computer disk without the use of moving tape. Once again, Dolby has conquered a technology that's ahead of his time.and used it in the name of rock and roll.

It's been a long time since Dolby last released a full album and "Eastern Block" – the standout sequel to 1981's "Europa And The Pirate Twins" – is his way of updating us. The new improved version of this song intertwines a simple Bo Diddly beat with samples from the older song and views on European unification, as seen through the eyes of a distant unfulfilled love. The quaint story of "I Love You Goodbye" is sweetened with violins, accordions, and descriptive lyrics like, "I would never normally go bowling/On a Friday morning in New Orleans/but I like to come here to remember/The kind of places you took me." The rambunctious, jamming groove on "Silk Pyjamas" temporarily veers the album away from its serious side, describing a city girl transplanted to a town "with no underground train."

But the album isn't all smooth sailing. "Close But No Cigar" isn't as lucky as its title suggests, "Cruel" is only slightly redeemed by Eddi Reader's supple vocals, and "I Live In A Suitcase" is burdened by its lyrical premise, taken several steps too far. Still, in spite of its defects, Astronauts & Heretics is an addictive comeback for the deserving Dolby, even if the master of technology still has some things left to learn.

About Last Night...

Looking for Love(seats) in All The Wrong Places

BY LAUREN DARE

Sometimes even I, the nightlife addict, get tired of the same old scene: the bars, the tired pick-up lines, paying for over-priced drinks that I deeply regret the next day through the polluted fog of a hangover. Sometimes something different is called for, something new and out of the ordinary, something really fresh and exciting, like... spending Friday night at Jordan's Furniture!

At this point, you probably think I'm kidding. Jordan's Furniture? Why would anyone want to go plop their tushies down on the "Antonio Moretti leathah sofer" set at Jordan's Furniture ("Main Street to Moody Street! Left on Spitbrook, right on Daniel Webster!") on a perfectly good Friday or Saturday night? There are no drinks available, they pipe in some kind of nightmarish Muzak on stereo speakers throughout the store, and the likelihood of scoring a hot date at Jordan's seems remote, at best.

JORDAN'S FURNITURE
289 Moody St., Waltham and Route, 24, Avon

Not, however, according to Barry and Elliot. Now I, like many of my New England contemporaries, have grown up listening to these two guys do their hokey radio spots in their unbelievable Massachusetts accents ("Sofer with a secret!"). And, like those same contemporaries, I have long been faced with one deeply troubling question: which one is Barry, and which one is Elliot? It's impossible to tell, listening to them chat away Siskel and Ebert-style, discussing LA-Z-BOYZ and recliners instead of picks and pans. They probably can't even tell each other apart.

Anyway, in a recent ad one of them suggested that Jordan's Furniture is the perfect place to come and spend a Friday or Saturday evening. Heck, they declared, it's a great time and you can even meet people there! Single's Night at Jordan's Furniture? Could this be true? Worth looking into anyway, so I called the corporate offices of Barry and Elliot trying to arrange a little personal tour, maybe have them set me up with some eligible guys who might be out looking at ottomans.

Sadly, Barry and Elliot were both out of town at the time and the receptionist wasn't that helpful when I asked if I could get in the Singles' thing on Friday night. So I decided, in true investigative journalist fashion, to go check out the scene myself. I shimmied into my hottest black skirt, had a couple of Absolut and tonics to prime up, and headed to the mecca of middle class furnishings.

Inside Jordan's, I discovered the world of "Undah Prices" in a veritable city filled with dinette sets, enough sofas to fill twenty hotel lobbies and enough home entertainment systems to make any Super Bowl fan weep. I strolled lingeringly through the armoires and dressers, passed quickly by the bunk-bed section (only masochistic children enjoy sleeping in a bed so narrow you have to strap yourself in to keep from falling into the lower bunk and landing on the unfortunate person sleeping below; then again, maybe that does sound like fun...) and moved purposefully to - you guessed it - bedrooms.

Barry and Elliot have lovingly amassed a collection of beds, all different styles, sizes, firmnesses, and colors. The minute I arrived in this bower of boudoirs, I started looking for the vibrating beds - you know - "Posturepedic With a Secret" but had to settle for motion-controlled, heated, user-friendly waterbeds. These proved to be worth taking for a test ride, and if I had met anybody at Jordan's, I would undoubtedly have asked him to join me for a little waterbed surfing. Since I didn't meet Mr. Right, or even Mr. Right Now, I am thinking about calling up Barry and Elliot when they return from vacation and asking them about truth in advertising. The only people this reporter saw at "Jordan's Furnitiah" were much too interested in how far the recliners went back and how many bags of doritos you can hide in the "secret" part of the Sofa With a Secret to ask me out.

So, if you want to try and sneak a quick roll on a waterbed at Jordan's my advice is to bring a friend with you; despite what Barry and Elliot say, I don't think you'll find the man (or woman) of your dreams cruising through the living room sets. But who knows? Stranger things have happened. And if you do, maybe you can get Barry and Elliot to throw in a layette set. ❑

BY ROCKIE GARDINER — MARCH 3 - 16, 1993

GENERAL FORECAST (If you know your ascendant, read it too)
Forward into the past. While Mercury, messenger of the gods, is retrograde (Feb. 27-March 22) old issues show up with alarming regularity, as do the people with whom you shared them. Although communication and travel hassles slow the pace of your current project, as a tradeoff you'll have more time to improve on the original. That is, if the fuckups (snafus?) don't drive you nuts. Venus, ruler of affection and attraction, is also turning retrograde on the 11th, so feel free to dump your current squeeze by claiming that you're so attuned to the rhythm of the universe, you felt this cosmic change of heart coming. You might even get away with this lame excuse because magnetic Venus in the sign of the single-minded Ram encourages self-centered activities, particularly passionate pursuits. Dissecting emotional entanglements will be the main activity until the Pisces-Virgo full moon (exact on the 8th at 1:46 a.m.) and the sun-Mercury meeting Monday night are history. Subtle advances in arts and technological smarts midweek, but while militant Mars squares (tests) judicious Jupiter, you might not notice your progress, just your prejudice. An excess of attitude means trouble; try to control your enthusiasm, expenses, pride and patriotic posturing before somebody does it for you.

ARIES (MARCH 20-APRIL 19)
Further conversation during the full moon about career opportunities that originated at the new moon and, when the sun favors your mid-heaven midweek, action. Don't try to impose your opinion on significant others (e.g. your public, a public defender) because all they'll see is your militancy, not a cute Crusader Rabbit. While magnetic Venus is moving backward in your sign, you might not be as popular as usual, however you can still attract a long-ago love to fill in the empty spaces. Venus goes direct on April 22.

TAURUS (APRIL 20-MAY 20)
A co-worker or fellow artist turns you on to an excellent opportunity, but until your birthday arrives, you won't see the full potential. Still, it pays to check it out, particularly if it leads to travel or study abroad. For the next two months while your Venus ruler is retrograde, you may feel you're in a social rut, and that's when an old emotional tie starts to look pretty good again. Blame or thank passionate Pluto, by retracing its steps through your marriage house, for giving you reasons to resuscitate the relationship.

GEMINI (MAY 21-JUNE 20)
Laughing all the way to the bank? Investment money and a career coup from info obtained before your Mercury ruler went retrograde. Congrats. If you want artistic approval or further financial backing, ask while the moon is full and the sympathies of parents, clients and employers are flowing freely. But don't ask casual friends for a favor or the union for its support. Your relationship to all groups – your place in their society, on their committee – is being reviewed, by them and by you, during the next six weeks.

CANCER (JUNE 21-JULY 22)
Movement. You're headed far away from familiar territory, past the pedestrian, back on the path to perfection. Not a typical weekend for a homebound Crab, but while your moon ruler is full in "I'd never settle for second best" Virgo, and Mercury merges with the Pisces sun (and the Universal Mind), you're outta here. Stressful? Only while antsy Mars in your sign is challenged to do, be, spend more around the 11th. An alliance with a ballsy female at work might not be such an asset anymore.

LEO (JULY 23-AUGUST 22)
Secretive Pluto turning retrograde lessens the anxiety over a family problem, but it's not really resolved. And Mercury retrograde in your house of taxes and investments means you'll be sorting through papers that were filed a while ago. Perhaps a payment from an insurance claim that'll cover further treatment, more job training or part-time help? No big deal, yet a positive development or a step out of debt, while buying into a friend's get-rich-quick scheme, while exciting and dramatic, is too much of a gamble now.

VIRGO (AUGUST 23-SEPTEMBER 22)
The full moon in your sign can turn a weekend event into a special occasion, like a half-birthday party in Wonderland. Let emotions get the best of you because the ride can be quite a thrill and not nearly as scary as you expect. Besides, with a retrograde Mercury ruler remaking the acquaintance of faces from the past and reviewing your creative output, you won't have the time or inclination for business as usual. Except around the 11th, when the maddest plan a friend lays out makes momentary sense. Watch out!

LIBRA (SEPTEMBER 23- OCTOBER 22)
Tragique! As your loving Venus ruler turns retrograde in your marriage house, a hot relationship can suddenly sour, leaving you stewing in your own juices for the next six weeks. Take precautions, don't leap (at a foreign-born fox) before you look and don't assume everything will work out for the best just because lucky Jupiter is in your sign. (It will, but not for a while.) The Virgo full moon focuses on your health house, the mind-body connection and water sports - find a hot tub to soak in.

SCORPIO (OCTOBER 23-NOVEMBER 21)
Babies and babes, fun and fertility – creative juices overflow during a full moon, especially when it shines on Pisces and Virgo lovers and friends. Music, art and poetry can add to the romance, but they shouldn't replace the sex, no matter how loaded you get. The problem with (and during) Pisces is escapism, holing up in the further regions of your mind, contemplating the vagaries of your soul. Because you're sooooo susceptible, curb that urge to space out, or, around the 11th, shoot the moon.

SAGITTARIUS (NOVEMBER 22- DECEMBER 21)
The crib, emotional security and your family tree – issues firmly rooted in your unconscious can't help spilling out during this fecund and teary full moon. While you might catch a glimpse of a career opportunity and hear cheers from a support group, nothing has quite the impact as your homegrown anxieties. Once you realize that entirely too many planets, including your Jupiter ruler, are retrograde, all a Sag seer can do is take another look at the past for insights into the future. And fool around with a friend.

CAPRICORN (DECEMBER 22-JANUARY 20)
Approval rather than acclaim, but if all you get from your sibling or neighbor is a nod of acknowledgment, consider yourself a victor, not a victim. Cosmic influences are still working in your favor, despite the slowdown caused by four retrograde planets, so if delivery on a goodie for the house is delayed or a choice assignment is postponed, don't pile up a list of grievances. As long as your partner is all fired up and ready to slay a dragon on your behalf, consider yourself very lucky and nobody's goat.

AQUARIUS (JANUARY 21-FEBRUARY 18)
You can find money where you don't expect to; not in a pot at the end of a rainbow, maybe in an old painting at a garage sale. But for that, alas one has to leave the bedroom. While horny Mars and enthusiastic Jupiter have you going at it like superstars, chances are you won't take time out. Pluto turning around at the top of your chart could mean a turnaround in your business, a change in a parent's course of recovery (physical or financial), or the return of the bullies on the block — the IRS, FDA, EPA?

PISCES (FEBRUARY 19-MARCH 19)
You don't have to be swamped by emotions or romantic notions unleashed during this full moon, but since your mind isn't on earthly things anyway, you may as well succumb to the fun of letting go. Dangerous? Not as long as you have someone with you with refined sensibilities and strong survival skills, e.g., an earth sign like Virgo. Buying and selling won't be profitable pastimes while Venus in your money house, but you might take out the pastels or refinish a table while you wait for Taurus to come around.

Kevin,
Listen, asshole, you're no longer married to her so stop trying to tell her how to run her life. It's been three years, get yourself a life. Oh, by the way, keep those support checks coming; we're looking to buy a 93 BMW and a house on the Cape. Only 15 years. Cheer up; maybe next time you marry someone as special as dough you won't *&$%^@ it up. Maybe have a couple more kids. Oh yeah, that's right, snip snip. CU in court.

Lynne,
I love you dearly, but don't ever sing to me again. New England Telephone has filed a complaint against us...so has the FCC.
Love, your roommate

Jerry,
Suck it up, would you just? It's not that bad. You may have lost your job and your dog, but you still have me. Unless you keep up that incessant whining. Then you'll just have you. Wise up.

Dear Mark of MIT,

Nate:
You are the saddest, most pathetic excuse of a human being that ever wasted space on this planet. I can see that nothing about you has changed, and nothing ever will. All I know is that if drugs and alcohol don't kill you first, someone will. Where do you get off telling me your son tragically died of pneumonia?? You're SICK and you need SERIOUS psychiatric help, pal. And here's a little advice: the next time you decide to make a total ass out of yourself and tell another outrageous lie, try not to get caught in it and at least have your mom back you up. Geez, was she ever surprised to hear her grandson passed away without her knowledge! And one more thing, you moron: don't even think about calling up my house and hanging up on me and my roommate any more, you gutless freak. If you do, expect a very unfriendly call from The Telephone Annoyance Bureau and the police. It seems that they have as much of an unpleasant history with you as I do. I hope you rot in hell...
From you know who

Susanne,
You're sooo innocent. A babe in the woods, as of yet unspoiled but soon to be experienced. Take this advice and heed its message well: Ready? O.K., Here goes: Drink, Drink, Drink. And when you're done . . .Drink. I'd say,"Stay unshaven, but this doesn't apply so just Drink. It builds character. Coglins Law: Beer is for breakfast.
Your Pal, T

Doom,
Don't feel bad, I'll probably get caught in a crossfire right before the earth opens. I recommend an increase in your dosage of Poodle Soufflées (don't tell Allison) to balance your loss. Vivacious Vivaldi

A solution to the question of how to make music history and music appreciation lively and fun for children – almost irresistible, in fact – can be found in a new series of tapes focused on musicians. In one, "Vivaldi's Ring Of Mystery: A Tale Of Venice and Violins," we hear the story of orphan Katarina, who ends up in the music school presided over by Antonio Vivaldi. The whole spoken story (Vivaldi befriends our Katarina, and the students prepare a fateful concert for the Duke of Palermo to be played at Carnival time) is bathed in the luscious music of the composer, which is central to the tale and used as background throughout – now gripping and ominous, now lyrical and tumbling with his familiar fruity beauty. At one point, Vivaldi shows how he takes – or might have taken – a chattery battle between two of the young orphan-students, transforming it into a piece of music, full of musical "argument" back and forth. Vivaldi tells Katarina how, at a certain time in his life, "Sunshine flowed down into my fingers and I played, and played. I couldn't write music fast enough: concertos, sonatas, operas. I poured all of Venice into my music, all its laughter, its birds, its storms, all its seasons," (as in "Four"). The story, which involves exciting trips through the canals, a friendly gondolier, high-minded girl musicians, scary-masked figures, a Stradivarius that mysteriously appears and the exuberance of Carnival, leads Katarina to a discovery of her true, and, of course, noble origins. Without so much as lifting a laboring neuron, children – and their parents too – can absorb the ethos of Vivaldi's music while following this story (and a shiver runs through it) to its conclusion. $10.

The Moss and the Rose

The owner of this little cupcake of a shop called Terra has lived in Greenwich Village apartments, and it shows in the white, arty charm of the place. The windows are flanked by mossy columns wrapped in gold ribbon, a hint of the ingenious ways Tori Jacobs has persuaded nature to bloom in artificial, but sweet, everlastingness. She makes deep bowls filled with moss and dried roses, adorns them with acorns, or supports them with cinnamon sticks. Twigs, twisted and joined, become planters filled with joltingly bright primroses, and are also used for a proscenium 'cage' defining the shop. Over there, on the large-size single brass beds, are durable white duck duvet covers, hand-painted with distinctive patterns – bunnies, old phones, 1920's dancers, all decorative enough to be slipcovers for a daybed. On them sit brightly-painted lacquered salad bowls; curled inside them are the shop's fluffy home-making kittens, Zoe and Max. Tender artifacts suggestive of a distant summer afternoon – like little girls' flowery hats, antique tea towels, runners and bits of terra cotta are another Terra theme. An enormous, ascetic wrought-iron chandelier – for candles – swoops down from overhead. As Terra is also quietly a gallery, hand-tinted pictures by Linda Cook are around and for sale. Tori is also the inventor of the comical Nipple Pillow, which is jampacked with those rubber tops of baby bottles interspersed, comically, with dried roses. Come summer, a little secret garden will be open in the back, selling the outdoor version of her distinctive indoor things. Open 11 a.m.-7 p.m. – just right for a post-work drop-in – and closed on Monday.

Spin Those Old Paper Towel Tubes Into Gold

I debated heavily about whether or not to buy the book – skinflintery begins with creative withholdings – but then borrowed The Tightwad Gazette secondhand. Some of Amy Dacyczyn's strategies involve transmuting mildly annoying household objects into the useful and amusing (she recycles things like 'pesky juice lids' into next-year's Halloween suit of armor). Many of her suggestions involve bypassing the ludicrously overpriced stuff by making your own, blending humble ingredients, such as the baby wipes made of paper towels and lotion and stuff, which you store in one old baby-wipe box (and mix the goo in yet another; you were a feckless shopper once). My favorite suggestion from this Maine-dwelling mother of six was the one where she said she sometimes buys coming-home presents in Maine, before going on a trip, rather than getting them out on the expensive road.

Because this book – and I do recommend you buy it, it's amusingly composed and compiled – is part of a chatty back and forth with the Community of Thrift in the form of a newsletter, you get suggestions like this: when drugstores etc. re-price items upward, sometimes items that are languishing in yesterday's price are hiding behind the newly-priced ones. Whole approaches to Christmas, weddings and birthdays are recommended, all swapping in wretched excess for ingenuity – the high-priced stuff can sit side-by-side with the figurative margarine, and bridesmaids get to keep their (silk) bouquets; that's their present from the bride. So many things lead two lives. Tightness has not made her spirit pruney, though. Dacyczyn deploys her resourcefulness bountifully, proving that one could get blood – or more practically, grape juice for the kids – from a stone. Since saving is a form of business, it's fitting one finds The Tightwad Gazette filed (at Wordsworth, at least) under "Business"...speaking of the letter T, not far from the Trump books. She also publishes a newsletter.

Improperly Yours

Right off the bat, let me introduce myself – Susanne E. Schantz, new Editor-In-Chief. Pleased to meet you. Let me also introduce this column – "Improperly Yours" will be appearing in this space, every issue from now on. Why? Primarily to let you know what's been going on at the Improper, and in the city we call home: why we chose the cover we did, where that feature came from, what's been going on in the city, and why its relevant to you.

I joined the staff of The Improper Bostonian approximately one year ago; until two weeks ago, I was managing editor for our previous editor, Tobin Streett. Now, it's my turn. After watching this magazine grow this past year and a half, I'm excited by both where it's been and where it's going. It's been a wild ride; we're growing in leaps and bounds.

Expect to see some changes in your Improper. After all, like the rest of us, the magazine is growing up. Take this opportunity to talk to us. Feedback, like daily lunches at the corner deli, keeps us going and keeps us focused. Tell us what you like. Tell us what you hate. Just keep in touch. Like your mother, we love hearing from you.

Improperly yours,

AROUND TOWN

A cerbic voice, squinty eyes, exasperated demeanor: all hallmarks of comedian extreme Gilbert Gottfried. The man, the parrot (Gottfried was the voice of Iago in Aladdin), the scrunched-up legend, who has been touring the country's comedy circuit, will be pacing the stage at Nick's Comedy Stop on March 19 and 20.

If you missed the latest Disney mega-hit, perhaps you know Gottfried as the crazed accountant bugging Eddie Murphy in Beverly Hills Cop II, or from his other scene-stealing roles in movies such as The Adventures of Ford Fairlain (with Andrew Dice Clay), Problem Child (with John Ritter) or Look Who's Talking Too (with John Travolta & Kirstie Alley). Come catch his outraged musings a 8:30 or 10:30 p.m.; tickets are $15. Call 482-0930 for information and tickets.

What could be more romantic than a musical tale of knights, queens, Old England and honor? Camelot, that dashing story of King Arthur and his Knights of the Round Table, fits the bill perfectly, and will be in town from March 30 through April 4 at the Wang Center for the Performing Arts. As if this wasn't enough, check out this added bonus: Emmy- and Grammy-winner Robert Goulet, star of the original 1960 version, is back as King Arthur.

Sigh over quixotic Guenevere (played by Patricia Kies) and Sir Lancelot (Steve Blanchard); shake at the evil Mordred (Kenneth Boys) and Merlin (James Valentine). Tickets range from $30 to $55. Shows are Tuesday through Saturday at 8 p.m.; Sunday at 7 p.m. and matinees Saturday and Sunday at 2 p.m. Call 931-2787 for tickets and information.

There's Lauren Bacall, and then there's...Bacall: By Herself, the hilarious new musical starring James Beaman. This wacky show, which was brought back by "popular demand," takes place at the Club Cabaret, 209 Columbus Avenue. Hear this legendary film star's story told, tongue firmly in cheek, through monologue, song (all done live – no lip sync here) and with audience participation. This performance lasts four nights only – March 25, 26, 27 and 28 – all at 8 p.m. Tickets are $12, call 536-0966 for reservations.

Hot international sounds, wild dancing and spangled costumes set the tone for Oba Oba '93, an untamed new musical playing at the Shubert Theatre (265 Tremont Street) from March 23 to April 4. Feverish Brazilian music and dance are the premise of this production, which includes everything from carnival congas to Rio's lambada (yes, the forbidden dance is not dead). Seventy-five dancers, singers and musicians make up this crew, which has toured Europe and the States. Performances are Tuesday through Saturday at 8 p.m.; Sunday at 7:30 p.m.; matinees Saturday and Sunday at 2 p.m. Tickets run from $22.50 to $42.50, and are available at the Shubert box office, or by calling Telecharge at 1 (800) 233-3123.

Dieters of the world, cry in vain, because on Sunday, March 28, you are going to be tempted beyond human endurance. The name of the temptress is the 15th Annual Great Chefs Taste Fair, and only a Hercules could withstand it. There will be celebrities – Victoria Kennedy, wife of Senator Ted, will be rustling up some Louisiana (her home state) Cajun dishes, former Bruins Gord Kluzak and Cleon Daskalakas will be dishing up their P.J.'s Big Beef Chili and signing autographs and Stacey Blain will be doing whatever Miss Massachusetts does – and there will be food, food, food. Dozens of top Boston restaurants are donating their wares to this event. Who needs to eat out at one restaurant when you can sample the menus of many?

And the cause couldn't be better – the National Kidney Foundation of Massachusetts is responsible for one million in kidney-related grants annually, primarily focused at research. Tickets are $15 and be purchased via Visa and MC (call 1-800-542-4001) – the event runs from 3 to 6 p.m. at Boston's Hynes Auditorium. For more information, see our Official Guide, page 19. Shown are Chef Ted Donaghue of A Steak In The Neighborhood (Sheraton Boston) serving Mike Neagle and JoAnn Dowling, co-chairs of the event, at a press preview.

THE IMPROPER TAKES A LOOK AT THE AREA'S FINEST SERVERS

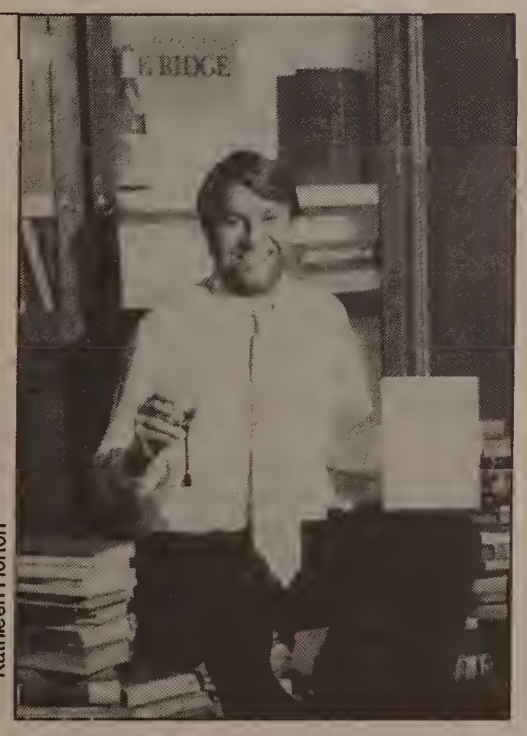
PAOLO DIECIDUE

IL PANINO
NORTH END, BOSTON

LOOKING FOR LOVE, HE FOUND A CAREER

Bo may know sports, but Paolo Diecidue knows food. After starting in the business as a 15-year-old dishwasher at Friendly's, today Paolo commands rank at one of the North End's most authentic Italian restaurants. What happened in between is the unique story of a waiter who deserves to be filed under "experienced."



At 22, with things other than food service on his mind, Paolo "ran off," he says, "to Italy, in pursuit of a woman." A successful courtship was followed by a position at the restaurant run by the woman's father in Sciacca, Sicily, where he found himself utterly unequipped to handle the position. "I was faking it," he says.

The head chef, vice president and professor at a highly-esteemed culinary institute, finally forced Paolo to enroll in his school after the young man set himself on fire trying to flambé a dish for a customer. Six months of intensive study later, Paolo returned triumphant, armed with a certificato from one of Italy's finest waitstaff programs. When the love story with his Italian mate ended, Paolo returned stateside and resumed his career, and his love affair with food. "This," he says simply, "is what I love to do." A dining experience hosted by Paolo, who is currently working at Il Panino, will prove this to be true.

JACK HOLBROOK

MICHAEL'S ON THE WATERFRONT
BOSTON

WHEN IT COMES TO WAITING, JACK WROTE THE BOOK

Kathleen Horton

Jack Holbrook alone can dispel any lingering notions that waiters are underqualified to handle much more than they do. Having recently completed his third novel, Ussuriland, a geo-political thriller set in the near future, Holbrook is as dedicated to his night job, waiting tables at Michael's, as he is to his day job of cranking out intellectual fiction.

A University of New Hampshire graduate with a degree in English, Jack has been in the restaurant business since he was thirteen, when he started out by helping some friends in a pinch who needed a dishwasher. He has been waiting tables ever since. A staple at Michael's almost since the restaurant opened, Jack manages to support himself working several nights a week. The rest of the time he devotes to his writing.

A veteran to the trade, Holbrook feels that the worst is behind him in terms of bad moments. "I don't think I'll ever forget," he smiles, "the night when I spilt Irish Coffee, complete with creme de menthe and whipped cream, right down into the middle of this woman's bouffant hairdo....It kind of hung there, for a moment, right in the middle of her hair, and then it started filtering down real slowly. I'll never forget that." Neither, probably, will the woman.

BRENDA AUGUSTINOS

THE GRECIAN YEARNING
ALLSTON

SERVICE, FRILLS-FREE BUT FAST

Brenda Augustinos has seen it all. After moving to Allston from Nova Scotia at the age of 11, Brenda began waiting tables after school at what was then the Baker's Dozen, on the corner of Harvard and Commonwealth Ave. Since then she's worked at pizza joints, swanky hotels, soda counters and coffee houses. A brash, motherly type, Brenda asserts that years of experience all over this town have taught her that what people want is not tinseltown courtesy, but down-home commonality. "People don't like nice," she explains. "They want real."

"Real," to Brenda, includes a staple "Okay-raise-your-hand-if-you-want-coffee-cause-I'm-not-going-to-ask-twice" greeting to Sunday morning tables. One busy morning in the fall, Brenda was confronted with a customer to whom she'd given the wrong plate. After he refused to return it, citing hunger, she furrowed her eyebrows, leaned less than lovingly into his face, and queried, "You wanna wear it, son?" The plate of food was retrieved.

Beneath this rough exterior, though, beats the heart of woman who loves her work. "Half my customers," she smiles, "call me Mom."

Waiting For Good Dough

Why Boston's Waitstaff Get No Respect

BY CHRISTOPHER FRANCESCANI

Waiters are politicians. They're expected to please everybody at all times, often for all the wrong reasons. They are gamblers, speculating with an optional gratuity system. Waiters are salespeople, marketing a constantly changing product essential to everyone who draws oxygen. They are servants to strangers and recipients of misdirected malice. Frowned upon for their career choice, the overwhelming populace of waitstaff commands about as much respect with the general public as do gas attendants and cabbies. No other professional seems so easy to abuse.

While the Internal Revenue Service recognizes tips as legitimate income, most banks do not. They don't consider tips legitimate, and won't give loans against them. In the Help Wanted sections of major newspapers, advertisements for waitstaff positions are listed under general rather than professional help. Waiters as service professionals are considered semi-skilled at best, a second-rate indignity until finding something "real." The term itself implies a sort of waiting period for something more exciting to happen, a highly unpopular notion amidst the go-getter spirit of American ingenuity.

If they weren't making any money at this (which they are), waiter's sub-working class status might be explainable. Teachers make next to nothing for the amount of high pressure work they do, but because they make so little, theirs is a profession without prestige.

Not so with waiters.

They often make substantial amounts of cash. In a social system as financially-oriented as ours, where income and prestige dance cheek-to-cheek, it's ironic that waiters are not considered highly-skilled professionals.

Conversely, on the other side of the Atlantic, waiting tables is a lucrative, high-profile position. "Saying you're a waiter in Europe is like saying you're an accountant. It's a respectable trade," says Paolo Diecidue, a server with experience on both sides of the Atlantic. Formal training at prestigious European academies, which specialize in the finer points of well-bred hospitality, is the prerequisite to a good position. On the Continent, it is considered a privilege to serve. Reflecting a cultural disparity, Europeans revere their service industry – a phenomenon wholly foreign to Americans.

"It's unfortunate in this country that so many people are afraid of food," says Julia Child, a household name and Cambridge resident. "Food should be fun." Why, then, isn't food taken seriously in this country? "It's general stupidity," she maintains.

Having been raised on McDonalds and Burger King, the reigning Hatfields and McCoys of the fast-food industry, we tend to view our national waitstaff as a confederacy of dunces, scraping together a living in a profession for which most Americans consider themselves overqualified.

Douglas Coupland, in his critically acclaimed bestseller Generation X: Tales For an Accelerated Culture, comments on the emerging ranks of college graduates in America, who find no better employment opportunities available than what he calls a "McJob: a low-pay, low-prestige, low-dignity, low-benefit, no-future job in the service sector."

Contrary to Coupland's typically American attitude, the task of waiting tables is as real as any job. With Massachusetts residents battling an ever-so-slowly convalescing economy, the number of full-time waitstaff in Boston is multiplying rapidly. In a time when belts are pulled tighter than ever, it is paradoxical that a gratuity-based service industry, such as waiting tables, is drawing new recruits almost as fast as the burgeoning ranks of American lawyers.

In actuality, the food service industry is the fastest growing sector of the economy in most states. In others, it's the only growing sector of the economy. Major newspaper are constantly upgrading their "Food" sections, and food editors are gaining critical ground as they increasingly find themselves among the nouveau celebrities in big cities throughout the country. At the forefront of the food game are waiters and waitresses, the foot soldiers of these establishments, front-runners in the new religion of courtesy in this country.

The statistics tell all. According to the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics, 1,747,000 people were employed as waiters in 1990. This figure is expected to grow to 2,196,000 by the year 2005. Total food service employment is expected to reach 12.4 million by 2005 – up from 9.5 million in 1990.

"Waiters are important," says Vivienne Wildes, founder and co-director of the newly-created, Maryland-based Waiters Association. "A multi-billion dollar food service industry hangs on the women and men who carry the food to the guests. They need to respect their jobs. When they do, their customers and employers do as well. Waiters are the ambassadors of hospitality."

The Waiters Association (the brainchild of two career veterans, Wildes and Gerard Foley, who got their start at a mom-and-pop restaurant in Mountaintop, Pennsylvania) is a professional rather than labor organization whose goal is "to upgrade the status of wait-

Steve Davis

AUJOURD'HUI
FOUR SEASONS HOTEL,
BOSTON

WHO COULD ASK FOR ANYTHING MORE?

A waiter with a track record that includes L.A., Seattle, Kansas and Boston, Steve Harris is the first black waiter to ever be hired at The Four Seasons Aujourdhui restaurant. Having grown up devoted to his mother's table, Steve feels privileged to have been introduced to the world of food and wine, a world he tries to share with everyone around him.

Currently working at the AIDS pediatric center in Roxbury, as well as being involved with "Little Brothers for the Elderly," Steve has recently volunteered to start up a waitstaff training program at a soul food restaurant he frequents. "This is a way out [of the inner city] for a lot of people," he explains, "and I want to make people understand that."

Extensively schooled in formal dining, Steve prides himself on his detailed knowledge of food and wine. "I've been trying to pull people away from white Zinfandel for years," he says. Often, he adds, customers are not familiar with certain items on the menu, and are too embarrassed to ask for assistance. He tries, he says, to assist them by making recommendations, or explaining the preparation of a particular dish, but this doesn't always work.

"When all else fails," he says, "they go straight to the chicken."

Katie Callahan

LEGAL SEAFOOD
PARK PLAZA, BOSTON

SWEET DISPOSITION LEADS TO A LEGAL FORTUNE

Katie Callahan possesses one of those angelic personalities that even the most obnoxious customers can't help but warm up to. Soft-spoken and naturally friendly, she says that she loves meeting new customers, especially when they have personalities like her favorite, Willard Scott, who did a Today show taping with Katie at her restaurant several years back.

A twenty-four year veteran at Legal Seafood, Callahan was initially hired by George Berkowitz, the chain's founder, when he opened his first restaurant at Inman Square in the 1950's. Reflecting on the old days, she says, "When I first started, there wasn't any training. I told George I didn't have any experience, and he says to me, he says, 'You just treat my customers as if they were guests at your own table and you'll be fine.' That was my training."

At the original Legal Seafood, Katie says "We served fish & fries. The people would get up and get their own coffee. The most expensive menu item was the 'The Fisherman's Platter'-$3.95." But that didn't mean the money was always small potatoes.

"Two gentlemen [once] came in," Katie says, "I waited on them, and as they left, one of 'em says to me, 'I hope you have some Scotch tape.' I went to the table, and we taped together this piece of paper – it was a $100 bill."

ers in America to a career level." They feel that the term waiter is a non-generic one, referring to both sexes: "like teacher, or lawyer." Their monthly newsletter, Hospitality, published its first issue in January of 1993. Plans are underway to offer insurance benefits and networking to America's waiters, and the association, which is currently being funded by the two founders, is applying for non-profit status.

"By 'good service' we do not mean give-me-my-burger-in-30-seconds-or-I-want-it-free," Wildes continues. "We mean trained, pleasant, happy-to-be-here waiters, the kind customers can't wait to tip. Why not see this as a career for talented, spirited and motivated people?"

Irish-born Katie Callahan, who has been with Legal Seafood since George Berkowitz opened his first restaurant at Inman Square in the 1950's, does see waiting tables as such a career. She should know. She's been doing it for nearly thirty years. "It takes a lot of energy and discipline," she says; "You have to love your job." While there are good and bad waiters in both the professional and the temporary divisions of the industry, most seem to agree that the bottom line is attitude.

A long-time local waitress in the Faneuil Hall area commented that "the old pros," such as herself, have the experience and commitment to handle any situation. They are, she notes emphatically, professionals. But she explains, with some disdain, that the young, temporary waitstaff don't take their jobs as seriously. "The new ones come in," she goes on, "and they're nice and they're cute, but they're there to make a buck. Today it's supposed to be 'speedy.' How 'speedy' can you get? Honestly," she says, "I don't know how some of it gets by [the management]."

Brenda Augustinos, another veteran, explains the allure of the temporary position. "It's a quick buck," she says. "What other job gives you such flexible hours, and the ability to make large amounts of money in a such a short time?" She points to college students as an example. "They come in, work six weeks, and they've got enough cash for Spring Break."

College students. The inexhaustible pool of cheap, semiskilled, temporary labor. In a college town like Boston, students comprise a large section of the city's waitstaff. In contrast to lifers like Brenda and Katie, students find that waiting tables can be a lucrative complement, often times a subsidy, to higher education. Walk into any restaurant in Boston, and you will find a struggling-young-something. They're everywhere: young musicians, young writers, graduate students, young dancers, married couples, young republicans, young painters, all struggling to support themselves until they find their niche in an uninviting New England economy.

The "struggling-young-something" scene has regurgitated some surprisingly big names. C. David Pugh, author of The Art of Waiting Tables: A Practical Guide For College Students, remembers his fiancee, while they were living in Manhattan, spending an unusual amount of time at a local joint called Cafe Central. "She was always in there," says Dave. "She'd come back and tell me about this great bartender there, that they called Bruno." Well, Bruno turned out to be short for Bruce, and Bruce to be short for Bruce Willis, Hollywood hotshot. For Willis, and thousands of others like him, waiting tables is a means to an end, a way to pay the rent and still concentrate on whatever other career is being pursued.

Not all waiters, though, start off as part-time dream merchants. Paolo Diecidue, currently a waiter at Il Paninos in the North End, says he does it not for the money, but because "this is what I love to do." "For me," he explains, "to have a customer say that this or that was excellent, or that the service was exemplary, that just gives me goosebumps."

In an age of obsessively health-conscious Americans, when everything from dairy products to red meat is coming under fire from the palette police, chefs across the map are hustling, now more so than ever, to redefine the time-worn concepts of American dining. Steve Harris, a waiter at the Four Seasons Hotel, sees himself as being on the cutting edge of an increasingly popular industry. "Food is always changing," he says; "Four years ago people never would have thought to put rare tuna on fois gras and serve it. Today it's one of the most popular dishes in town."

He feels that as a professional waiter he is marketing a constantly changing product. "If you're serious about [waiting tables], you have to keep abreast of the changes in the industry. You have to read the food sections and know wine...because you bring this knowledge to the table with you, as a service to your guests." It was this type of attitude towards his job that landed Steve a $1200 tip one night last summer.

There is more to waiting tables, though, than just a good attitude. What the customer sees when he or she dines at a restaurant is only the stage on which the waitstaff perform, half dancing their way through the two-way traffic in and out of the kitchen, arms loaded with hot plates. Every night is opening night and each table a new audience. These impromptu players create the atmosphere, calculating reactions while they read their audiences: where to get involved, when to remain reserved, what to say and how to say it.

There's a world of activity that the customer never sees. Behind the scenes, in the kitchen, the staff scurries to meet stringent time requirements, coordinating the dining experience for anywhere from 20 to 120 hungry patrons. As with any live performance, problems inevitably arise. Anyone who's ever worked in a restaurant will tell you this. Meeting multiple demands, handling any one of the thousands of situations that arise every day in the restaurant business-whether it be an impossible customer, a shortage of coffee cups, or a broken glass in the ice bin, waiting tables demands an uncommon amount of patience and split-second decision-making. "Anyone who thinks that they can walk off the street and wait tables as well as our staff, and several people have imparted this sentiment to me over the years, has never done it before," says Bill Schmidd, an accomplished general manager in the industry.

So, gentle reader, next time you dine out be mindful of the fact that the production being put on for you is a multifaceted one, and that in addition to the actual performance, there is plenty of preparation and fervent activity that you never witness. When the curtain falls and the bill is dropped, if you have enjoyed your experience, let it be reflected in your tip. When your waiter extends courtesy to you in a professional manner, treat him or her as a professional. Tip big. ❑

JEFFERSON MEDEIROS

PAPA RAZZI
CHESTNUT HILL, NEWTON

BUSBOY WITH THE MOSTEST

Jefferson Medeiros loves people. You realize this the moment you meet him. "And how ah you today, my friend," he'll ask anybody who's nearby, a smile lighting up his face. According to Bill Schmidd, Papa Razzi's general manager, Jefferson isn't just a top-notch busboy, but "a saint, no question about it."

A busy night at Papa Razzi finds Jefferson weaving through the crowded dining room, 40 or 50 pounds worth of plates on his arm, laughing and smiling as if he were at a party. "I like the people very, very much," he explains.

When Jefferson is not busy clearing and resetting tables, he is patrolling the floor, looking to help: filling water glasses, seating guests, even taking orders. Jefferson is the closest thing to a surrogate waiter that any restaurant could hope to find.

Born and raised in Rio di Janeiro, Jefferson immigrated to America several years ago, and currently lives in Allston, with his wife and four year old daughter. When he's not at Papa Razzi, he works as a produce clerk at Star Market in Cambridge.

Recognized at the regional level by a company that normally reserves this honor for tenured employees, Jefferson is one of the most popular among a waitstaff that prides itself on a sense of humor and an uncommonly congenial relationship with the clientele. He does it with a wide smile, a great attitude and a belief in service with style.

JEAN BEURSTENS

LOCKE-OBER'S
WINTER PLACE, BOSTON

HIGH-QUALITY SERVICE

Kathleen Horton

That first transition occured when he was approached at the Fair by a Mr. Saloway, who proposed that Jean and his father-in-law open a restaurant called Rugbymen in Jamaica Towers. Unable to obtain a liquor license, the restaurant, like so many in this business, closed down soon after its opening. But Jean had decided to settle in America. He next took a job waiting tables at the Rib Room in Braintree, and, when that restaurant was sold, he got a job through a friend at Locke-Ober's. He liked it so much that he never left.

One of the upsides of working at a restaurant of Locke-Ober's caliber is that Jean finds himself constantly waiting on celebrities (one glance at the pricey menu will explain why). He reels off an impressive list that includes Rosalind Carter, the Kennedy family (regulars at the restaurant), Governor Connolly from Texas, Joan Crawford, George Pepard, Terry Bradshaw, and violinist Issac Stern, to mention a few. With a clientele like this, Jean says he rarely makes a mistake.

To contrast his high-pressure position at Locke-Ober's, he likes to paint flowers and still-lifes, but "no people," he adds emphatically. He gets enough of people, he says, at the restaurant. Any plans for the future? Without hesitation, he smiles and says, "Retire and fish steadily."

Dotty Fauscher

Durgin Park
Faneuil Hall, Boston

Serving up a sweet helping.

If you don't pay close attention, you could think that Dottie, a famous Durgin Park waitress, is schizophrenic. One moment she's a sweet, soft-spoken grandmother-type given to clasping your hand as she passionately explains her love for the profession, next minute she's a quick-witted, foul-mouthed little firecracker brandishing a button that reads "Beyond Bitch."

In reality, Dottie really is two women, both named Dottie, who share between them nearly 60 years of service at the world famous Durgin Park restaurant, located in Faneuil Hall. The two Dotties, like Yin and Yang, occupy opposite sides of the collective server experience.

"I've met some really wonderful people here at Durghin Park," says Sweet Dotty. "It's only the really old bastards that grab your ass," counters Saucy Dottie, "I tell 'em, I says 'You can't grab my ass, I got a girdle on, there's nothing to grab!"

Sweet Dotty, AKA Dorothy Fauscher, began waiting tables following the death of her husband. After several months at a steak house in North Andover, she came to Durghin Park, where she has been ever since.

Saucy Dottie, AKA Dottie Ladny ("Call me Dottie-Lamb. Everyone around here does," she says) started out thirtysomething years ago at an extinct bistro on Tremont Street, called The Mayflower. She saw an ad in the paper, applied to Durgin Park, met Dotty Fauscher, and has also been there ever since.

Watching these two in action is a thing of beauty. Customers enter the dining room while the interview is in progress, and request the two as their waitresses. While Dottie-Lamb seats them ("Sit over there."), Dotty greets them ("Hi, where are you folks from?"). Unhurried, Dottie-Lamb heads to the table with napkins and silverware. She throws the silverware onto the table and shouts, "Pass it around," as she drapes a napkin over the gentleman's head and walks away, muttering something about "You'll have to wait, I'm being interviewed."

Despite their disparate personalities, both are sweet older women who approach the waiting profession from very different angles. Dotty Fauscher, for instance, has a special affinity for the landmark restaurant. "When I retired, back in 1982, I would get homesick every morning around 11:30. So I came back, and here I am," she smiles. Her golden rule is "never, even though it kills you, lose your temper."

Dottie-Lamb Ladny, who comes across more like a lion, says she has a "Reputation for fooling around. [Patrons] come in here and I try and entertain 'em." One way she keeps them laughing is with her ongoing, off-color commentary. Like the time she turned to a gentleman as she grabbed a water pitcher, and, glancing at the man's broken arm, and exclaimed, "Well, you sure ran out of the wrong bedroom, didn't you?" She giggles, winking conspiratorially. "He laughed and laughed and laughed." Does she think that she's a good waitress? "I figure I'm doing pretty good for an old broad." So do we.

FLICKS IN A FLASH

Groundhog Day

"Funny, time after time"

This is a classic Harold Ramis film, despite the odds against a film based on repetition being anything but annoying. Bill Murray gives a vintage performance as weatherman Phil Connors, a man stuck in time and in Punxsutawney, Pennsylvania. Andie MacDowell (under-used as Connors' new station producer) and Chris Elliott (as cameraman Larry) add to the comedic mix as Connors finds himself forced to deal with the same situations, people and television shows over, and over, and over again. T.S.L.

Lorenzo's Oil

"A Brave and Daring Brew"

Based on the lives of Augusto and Michaela Odone, Lorenzo's Oil is the story of a couple's efforts to save the life of their son from adrenoleukodystrophy (ALD). In this gritty, painful and brilliant picture, the parents (Nick Nolte and Susan Sarandon) not only push the medical establishment for answers, but take up ALD research on their own. While keeping their marriage and their son alive. Nolte's Italian accent is annoying for a while, but it is the only false note in an otherwise important film about the power of determination in the face of helplessness. B.C.

Love Field

"On Shaky Ground"

Love Field is a modest tale surrounding two separate journeys that merge into one. Michelle Pfieffer does a good, albeit shrill, job as Lurene Hallett, the Southern housewife on a bus pilgrimage to J.F.K.'s funeral. On her trip she meets, and becomes involved with Paul Cater (played superbly by Brian Kerwin), a quiet black man traveling with an abused orphan he is attempting to save. Small but powerful moments of racial drama almost make this film great, but its insistence at attempted "big screen" moments make it a toss-up. A.L.

Scent of A Woman

"Pacino Reeks of Hoffman"

A blind, grouchy, former military officer (Pacino) takes his new prep school "babysitter" (Chris O'Donnell) on a Thanksgiving weekend extravaganza in New York City. While the youth frets for Pacino's safety (and about his own problems at school), Pacino overtips waiters, dances the Tango and correctly identifies the perfume (not to mention the hair and eye color) of every woman he meets. B.C.

Matinee

A B-Movie That Earns a B-Plus

The scene is Key West, 1962, and the latest B-movie thriller from "Shock Expert" Lawrence Woosley (John Goodman) is coming to town. The timing is perfect: the Cuban Missile Crisis has just begun, and the fear outside the theater mirrors the melodrama inside. Writer Charlie Haas (Gremlins) provides us with a fair enough script, replete with irony, some romance, sentiment, and of course humor. Director Joe Dantre recreates 1962 in excruciating detail. The jokes were best coming from Goodman, but the remaining members of the cast are on the level of The Wonder Years. Matinee tends to overreach itself by trying to fit in romance, drama and comedy in one nostalgiac package, but for entertainment value and laughs, the movie earns a strong B-plus. T.S.L.

Bad Lieutenant

A Good, Gritty Look at the Mean Streets

Harvey Keitel in "Bad Lieutenant"

BY KAJ WILSON

Bad Lieutenant gets on your nerves, and under your skin. When Harvey Keitel's no-name, red-eyed, junkie cop isn't busy scoring, stealing or doing drugs (and giving the more suggestible viewers among us a nasty contact high), he's gambling – playing You Bet Your Life on the Dodgers – or indulging his taste for S&M sex shows and masturbating in front of teenage girls. There's nothing casual about the bad lieutenant's excesses and outrages. This is a man whose life is on an urgent downward spiral.

The baddest city of all, New York provides the most appropriate of backdrops for the bad lieutenant's story. The director, Abel Ferrara, makes the streets of Manhattan hum with criminal activity, providing a background noise which the bad lieutenant, like a good New Yorker, ignores as best he can. Finally, however, one crime does manage to get through to him, and shake him at his core. A nun is raped (in church....on the alter....with a crucifix).

His first reaction is cynical: he's a lapsed Catholic interested only in the reward money. But soon his spiritual longings – longings which include a sexual component – kick in. He sees the nun – naked, and bearing a strong resemblance to the Virgin Mary – being examined on a hospital table shortly after the rape. Later, he is shocked to learn that she refuses to identify her assailants; she's forgiven them. The nun, without any realization, provides the bad lieutenant a shot at redemption. After all, he's only the bad, not the evil, lieutenant.

There is something appalling, but at the same time comical and secretly liberating about watching the bad lieutenant shamelessly indulge himself. Sid and Nancy, another urban tale about junkies hell-bent on destruction, had a similar appeal. The characters are monstrous infants, all desire and appetite, with just enough wherewithal as adults to continue feeding the monster.

Bad Lieutenant

An Aries Film Release
Directed by Abel Ferrara
Starring Harvey Keitel
Zoe Lund

Rated NC-17

In spite of the excesses, the bad lieutenant is a believable character – there is something familiar about him. In one scene, a coked-up and drunk lieutenant, upon hearing over the car radio that his baseball team has lost, pulls out his gun and shoots his radio. Realizing what he's done in the middle of a city street, in broad daylight, he plops his police light on the hood of his car, turns on his siren and hauls ass down the street. As crazy as the scene is, it doesn't seem that farfetched, not if you've ever wondered if a cop speeding past you down the street is really responding to an emergency or is just in a hurry to get somewhere.

That the bad lieutenant seems at all accessible is the result of Harvey Keitel's extraordinary performance. This wonderful actor who played a cop in Mortal Thoughts, a cop again in Thelma and Louise, and a good-guy robber in Reservoir Dogs is not a dazzler – you aren't swept up and carried away by his intensity, technique, or charisma, although he demonstrates all three.

He wields his power subtly by imbuing even his wildest characters with an everyday, real-life quality. You feel like you know him from somewhere, that he might live near you (hopefully not too near). If this acting job has anything to do with it, the bad lieutenant is on its way to becoming a cult classic, and Harvey Keitel is finally going to get the recognition he deserves.

If you would like to see more of Harvey Keitel and the inspiration for Bad Lieutenant, we suggest renting Martin Scorsese's 1975 masterpiece Mean Streets. ❑

MAD DOG AND GLORY

Searing Comic Performances from Murray and De Niro

Despite initial reservations Wayne Dobie (Robert De Niro) eventually falls in love with his "gift" for a week, Glory (Uma Thurman) in "Mad Dog and Glory"

BY ANTHONY LEIBS

Mad Dog and Glory is an exhilarating odd-couple story, a surprisingly smart look at the complexity of male bonding. It might have gone wrong in a hundred different ways, but, somehow, it manages to stay true to its wised-up, unsentimental self.

Robert De Niro plays Wayne "Mad Dog" Dobie, a shy, lonely evidence technician for the Chicago Police (he photographs the corpses), who saves the life of loan shark Frank Milo (Bill Murray) when he breaks up an armed robbery attempt at a grocery store. Milo, needless to say, is grateful, and rewards Dobie with a one-week visit from Glory (Uma Thurman), a beautiful young woman whom he "owns" as part of a loan-repayment deal with her gambler brother.

In one of the few predictable developments in Richard Price's clever and sympathetic script, Dobie and Glory fall in love. But Price wisely focuses on the relationship between Dobie and Frank Milo, which is much more complex and interesting. The mobster and the cop recognize a mutual yearning: Dobie, the timid technician, joins the police in an attempt to force some excitement into his life – he'd rather be an artist.

Milo, the loan shark, would rather be a stand-up comic – he even goes so far as to buy his own comedy club. Milo craves public recognition, but his underworld job demands a low profile. He doesn't much like his simple-minded mobster cronies, but, like Dobie, feels trapped in his job. Both would like to be someone else. They may be on opposite sides of the law, but the two form a curious, touching bond.

As Dobie, Robert De Niro has once again transformed himself, this time into an average guy. It's harder than it sounds. In past films such as True Confessions and Falling in Love, De Niro was a flop as an everyman – without his intensity and eccentricity, he proved he could be as boring as anyone else. Here, with his bad haircut and a nerdy, polyester-rich wardrobe, he convincingly portrays the most ordinary of men. He has somehow made himself look physically small – nothing like his sinewy, muscular Max Cady in Cape Fear. When he flexes his muscles for Glory, the audience laughs. (One wonders what Dan Harvey, listed in the credits as "Mr. De Niro's personal fitness trainer," did to earn his money.)

MAD DOG AND GLORY

Universal Pictures
Directed by John McNaughton
Starring Robert De Niro
Uma Thurman
Bill Murray

But it is Bill Murray's performance as Frank Milo that is the real transformation. Taking his first stab at a dramatic role since The Razor's Edge, he is entirely believable as the complicated, unhappy Milo, equal parts charming, sinister and pathetic. Murray's acne-scarred skin and beady eyes are used to menacing effect, and it helps that he is physically bigger than De Niro – when his rage explodes, he's truly frightening.

But he's far greater than the sum of his unhandsome parts – for perhaps the first time, he's taking a chance with his acting. Murray has too often coasted through his films with little more than his ace comic timing and a deadly sense of irony, but here he handles every nuance and shading Price has written for him, and has allowed the nasty, bullying aspects of his personality to come through. In a movie that's filled from top to bottom with excellent comic performances, Murray more than holds his own. ❑

★ This dark comedy stands out

A bad day gone psycho, this movie portrays Michael Douglas (whom we only know by his license plate name, D-FENS) as a regular guy turned Bernie Goetz. We follow him on a path through the city, as he encounters, and deals with, traditional and expectable urban aggravations. Despite mediocre performances by co-stars Barbara Hershey (as D-FENS ex-wife) and Robert Duvall (a desk jockey cop pursuing the incensed Douglas), this film will strike a nerve with anyone who's ever had "one of those days," without D-FENS's mode of dealing with it. T.S.L.

ALIVE

★ Survivor's Tale of Strength and Spirit"

When a plane carrying a South American rugby team crashes in the Andes mountains en route to Chile, the surviving team of athletes find themselves marooned with little food, shelter or method of communicating with the outside world. Based on a true story, Alive is as much a tale of spiritual discovery as of physical endurance. The men who comprise the bulk of the cast are mostly new faces, with the exception of Ethan Hawke (Dead Poets Society) and Vincent Spano (Rumble Fish). Alive is a moving film — a story of strength and even humor. We follow the survivors daily struggles, and though the cannibalism scenes are not for the squeamish, Alive is a reminder of the fragility of our life on earth. T.S.L.

A FEW GOOD MEN

★ "Exciting, Moving, and Funny"

Rob Reiner hits on a fail-safe formula for his latest picture: big stars in a politically-relevant drama, climaxing in riveting courtroom exchanges in A Few Good Men, a film in which two Marines are on trial for murdering one of their own. Lawyers Tom Cruise and Demi Moore try to prove the death was accidental as a result of secret disciplinary orders from above. Tom Cruise reprises his usual hot shot character role with élan, while Demi Moore hands in a respectable and dignified performance as an internal affairs officer. Jack Nicholson, while convincing as a hard-nosed colonel, tends to lapse into Nicholson-ese, playing the sly, smart-mouthed speechmaker. A Few Good Men contains decent comedy as well as moving action, and winning lines are equally distributed. T.S.L.

ALADDIN

★ "Pure Magic From Disney"

Disney Pictures have outdonbe themselves yet again with a sure to be classic, in large part thanks to Robin Williams, lending his manic comedic talent to the Genie. The Disney animators keep pace with him, giving him, giving his imaginative rantings visual action, and William's rapid fire humor is only heightened with these visual aids. Although Prioncess Jasmine is as liberated as Belle in Beauty and The Beast, she cannot escape being drawn with comely cleavage and a 10-inch waist. Aladdin is a lovable poor boy, but for accuracy's sake wher did this Arabian kid pick up giving his monkey "five" and spouting "No way?" If you haven't seen an animated movie since childhood, go see Aladdin to recapture a feeling Disney introduced into many people's childhood: joy. T.S.L.

ARE YOU WHAT YOU WEAR?

The ICA Examines Cross-Dressing

BY KATHY MATHESON

"If you can't be pretty, at least you can be interesting."

These are the words one reads on the brightly-colored throw-pillows piled up in one of the installations at the Institute for Contemporary Art's most recent exhibit, "Currents '93: Dress Codes." That quote is also probably the best way to sum up an exhibit on cross-dressing that, depending on who you talk to, can be considered as a political statement, a lesson in cultural education, a defense of free speech or just a gratuitous exercise in frivolity.

It's certainly quite different from the ICA's last exhibit, where you entered to the sound of gunshots and visions of a man spinning around upside-down. This time, you enter to the hip-hop beat of the song "Supermodel (You Better Work)," and the serenades of a self-described trashy, Jewish, communist, safe-sex porno drag queen. "This show isn't really in-your-face," he deadpans. "It's in your crotch."

But more on that later.

Critics of the show as a concept, much less as an actual exhibit, will surely say that transvestites (cross-dressers), transsexuals (those who have undergone sex-change operations) and transgenderists (those who live as a member of the opposite sex) are such a minute segment of society that this exhibit is simply self-serving, and of no use to anyone.

"Dress Codes" certainly does make you think. Catherine Opie's installation, a mounted row of 10-15 color portraits (head shots), looks like a simple series of somewhat grungy-looking males posed against an identical yellow background. But upon closer examination, those mustaches and goatees turn out to be fake; in fact, all of the models are lesbian friends of Opie's. Not able to find acceptance as tough women, they pose as men in photos and, ironically, find acceptance because they have cross-dressed.

CURRENTS '93: DRESS CODES

Then there are the performance artists, Hunter Reynolds and Abe Rybeck. Reynolds seems to be the more demure of the two, as you watch him silently spin on a rotating pedestal. Fully made-up but not wearing a wig, the artist is dressed in a strapless, black satin ball gown with the names of 25,000 AIDS victims emblazoned in gold on the dress.

Rybeck, on the other hand, is the afore-mentioned trashy, Jewish, communist, safe sex porno drag queen. In any given performance, he may portray one or all of his characters: Millicent de la Femme, Rachel Tension and Madge, the Palmolive Lady. No matter which one you see, you're sure to hear him belt out an original tune such as "I Am What I Wear" (which, of course, is "Damn expensive!"), "Blame it on the Big Banana" or "This Is Not a Test."

Less flamboyant, but equally important to the exhibit are New York artists Lyle Ashton Harris and Mariette Pathy Allen, to name just two of many. Using a multimedia installation, Harris explores both gender and race as he tries to relate what it means for him to be a young, gay African-American in 1993. Allen, who has studied cross-dressing since 1977, displays many color photos in her documentation of transvestites' relationships with their families.

If "Dress Codes" starts to awaken some long-buried yearning within you, or if you just want to have some fun, the gift shop – which would double for another installation if it weren't for the cash register – is stocked with wigs, glasses, false eyelashes, cosmetics and funky clothes. For those of you who are really serious about experimenting with cross-dressing, the ICA is sponsoring workshops. The Drag King workshop takes place on April 10, and a "make-up, wig and fashion techniques" workshop will hit March 23, Apr. 20 and May 9.

Yasumasa Morimura, "Doblonnage: Marcel", 1988

With the opening of "Dress Codes," it's clear that the ICA has set out to challenge people's attitudes about gender, fashion and sexuality. The question now revolves around whether the public is willing to listen. ❑

"Dress Codes" runs through May 30.

My Children! My Africa!

Heartfelt Issues In Sparse Presentation

Donald Swaby stars as a South African youth struggling to break from the apartheid stranglehold in My Children! My Africa!

BY NANCY LEONARD

In its Boston-area premiere at the New Repertory Theatre, Athol Fugard's "My Children! My Africa!" is a spare, heartfelt cry for reason amidst bloody insurrection. While this gifted South African playwright forged his career in opposition to his country's stringent apartheid policies, this 1989 work warns about the dangers of succumbing to new tyranny in the name of freedom. That danger has been part of most every social revolution throughout history; it's startling that this modest three-character work so effectively confronts fundamental issues of political philosophy, sparking debate all round.

The action is set in Camdeboo, South Africa, in 1985 - primarily in the rundown Bantu enclave on the edge of town, known as "The Location." A dedicated teacher, Anela Myalatya - "Mr. M," for short - has arranged a debate between his boys' school and a posh girls' high school in Camdeboo. It's a pioneering event. His most promising pupil, Thami Mbikwana, will be arguing for gender inequality against Isabel Dyson. She is the rebel in her sober, sensible, middle-class British family, and wants to be a writer. Her opponent is from Capetown, a boy who came to the peaceful flatland town for his education, hoping maybe to become a doctor.

But times are changing, just as Thami has changed from an eager scholar to an impatient young man, doubting the system will bring improvement. At Mr. M's urging, the rival students join forces to enter a literature contest. Their preparations over the course of several weeks provide an opportunity for the playwright to explore the dilemma of dealing with the future. While the young people gain a friendship and greater insight, a school boycott puts an end to their collaboration. Unrest erupts in The Location, as whispered voices are fanned into shouting by Communist outsiders from the north. It may be too late for debating, but action can produce tragic, unintended consequences.

Fugard's play is constructed on terse scenes and monologues, and reaches its climax in some vivid, first-person accounts involving offstage mob violence. There are times when the work seems preachy and schematic, and in need of greater dramatic life. But his keen attention to theme and detail (for example, using breakfasts to portray contrasting lifestyles) and distinct personalization of the issues - three people, three vantage points - authoritatively advance the drama, and in the end, pack considerable punch. Fugard is cautioning against wasted lives. Liberation without education, he says, threatens to destroy the promise of all of Africa's children. The emerging leaders can be swallowed by the fury.

Director Joanna Zazofsky moves the action along expeditiously on a relatively bare stage. Three rectangular screens, suspended in blackness, provide a specific framework, beginning with a trifurcated map of South Africa and proceeding through photographs of various people and settings. It's an economical way to supply imagery, but generally those black-and-white images remain at some distance from the live action. There was a deliberate intention to have the actors speak as Americans, ultimately conveying a sense of universality. But without a specific South African accent or atmosphere, the production slights the great gulfs in that racial climate. As a result, the actors have a harder job keeping the complexities in sharp focus, and the challenge is not always met.

Allen Oliver - who has appeared in several roles at Providence's Trinity Repertory Company - gives a well-honed performance as the dutiful teacher, who is striving amidst bleakness and despair to create a generation of reasonable leaders to secure freedom for his people. Mr. M's dedication is strong, but his methods are moderation and persuasion. Donald Swaby, a student at Boston University's School of Theatre Arts, is personable and pleasing as the restless young man. He nicely captures the buttoned-down sensibility of the traditional system and the internal conflicts which mark Thami's passionate but dangerous course. This actor should have a bright future.

As Isabel, Eliza Gagnon performs with a certain hesitancy that seems at first appropriately schoolgirlish, but then somewhat shy on characterization. Though desirous of reaching out for change and appreciating her expanding horizons (at least until violence descends), the young girl should have more personality and conviction.

Eric Levenson's scenic and lighting design is serviceable, though his illumination could be more varied and active. Charlotte Asbury's costumes are fine and Billie Cox's sound design conveys some African resonance and music. Athol Fugard has moved on to confront the changing South African landscape. Here, he sounds a cautionary note - along the lines of sowing the wind and reaping the whirlwind. ❑

The Love Goddess Rules

Watch Out Unbelievers ... Judy Tenuta is Coming

BY ROSS GARMIL

I never was a Boy Scout, but I've always admired their motto "Be Prepared." Perhaps I should have heeded it when I took on an interview with Judy Tenuta. Sure I've seen her perform many times on television, but nothing I've seen before could have prepared me for the experience of speaking directly with her.

She began by asking me what I was wearing (when I told her that I had on torn jeans she exclaimed "Oh my God, I'm talking to Cindy Crawford's nephew!"), told me about her pig boyfriends, performed a multitude of impersonations, read to me from some trash newspapers, and commanded me to get down on my knees and worship her.

Judy Tenuta is not your average comedienne. She is, after all, a self-declared Love Goddess. But that's not all. She's also the Earth Mother Hostess, Geisha Girl Buffer of Foreheads, Healer of Hermaphrodites, Blesser of Bunions, Queen of Candypants, Baroness of Bocci Ball, Tamer of Trolls, Squidmistress to Studs, Fatimah of Fertility, and All Mistress of Time, Space, and Pantyliners. "Also," she adds, "I can be Ginger."

These are just some of Judy's different personalities. The two things they have in common are that they're all very funny and they all play accordion.

Chances are you've seen Judy on television toting her squeeze-box and pitching her religion, "Judyism." This flowery woman in flowing robes has a voice which reaches previously unrecorded decibels and a mind which jumps all around the spectrum of pop culture. Ross Perot, Shelly Winters, Bob Packwood, Rosanne Arnold, Joey Butafuoco, Katherine Hepburn, John Travolta, Oedipus: she's got them all covered. "Maybe I'm watching too many Hard-on Copies," she ponders.

If you haven't seen her act you may be thinking to yourself, "Accordion? Isn't that for weddings?" Well, not the way Judy uses it. To Judy, the accordion is a defense mechanism, a "goddess shield." After all, she needs some protection from the throngs of adoring "pigs" (men, to you and me) who rush the stage in order to grab hold of her flowing gowns. "I'm like a Who concert with a bra," she explains.

Judy, who is coming to The Comedy Connection at Faneuil Hall this month, did have a few choice words about our lovely burg. "I like Beantown...I always feel like a speech therapist when I'm [here]." Maybe that's another one of her personalities. She also had a word or two about Bostonian fashion: "Why is every woman over fifty and walking around with a plaid skirt?" she demands, "Do we have to be a highlander?" But don't be offended at this criticism. After all, she is a goddess.

Can't seem to get enough of Judy? Well don't fret, she should soon be hitting many store shelves. Not only will she soon be introducing a new perfume named "Scent of a Goddess," (don't hold your breath), but she's also working on a new album. It will include "some diva goddess songs for dancing studsicles," as well as, of course, Judy's comedy. "Is it live?" we asked. "No, no," she answered, "it's Memorex."

Judy Tenuta will be appearing at the Comedy Connection at Faneuil Hall on March 25th & 26th. ❑

Judy Tenuta bares most.

Everybody's a Comedian

A grasshopper walks into a bar and orders a beer. The bartender says, "You know, we have a drink here named after you." The grasshopper looks up excitedly and says, "Really? You have a drink named Irv?"

Pretty funny, huh? What, think you can do better? Well then go ahead and try. Send in your favorite joke (anecdote, humorous quip, etc.) to:

CELEBRITY GUEST REVIEWS

Marais: The Meal Beyond the Myth

BY GERI DENTERLEIN

Anyone who's anyone has been to Marais, the trendy Boylston Street restaurant that fancies itself to be a touch of Paris. In less than a year, it has become the latest place to see and be seen, even if it involves the indignity of waiting outside on an icy winter evening. Part of the fun is surveying the crowd for familiar faces from Boston's world of sports, television and radio. Even the owners of the city's best restaurants, like Paolo DiBenedetti of Paulo's in the North End, spend time at Marais, sharing bottles of vintage wines, like Clos du Val 1987 Semillon.

On a Thursday evening, the bar was two and three deep, not even mentioning the crowd snuggling up near small tables in an area that doubles as a cafe. Most are passing time until 9 o'clock, when the Marais discotheque Esmé opens, and beautiful people gather hoping to meet the person of their dreams – even if the dream lasts only the night.

With all this action, it almost doesn't matter how the food is. However, for the record, it is imaginative, experimental, spicy, and, for the most part, pretty good.

The dining atmosphere – that's another matter. To begin with, who can take seriously a restaurant that covers its tablecloths with white paper? In addition, we had the misfortune of being seated at a small table in the middle of the dining room. It was as peaceful as the median strip on the Central Artery at 5 o'clock.

What would provide a balm to this chaos? A drink, of course. But it was fifteen minutes before they arrived. At least it gave us time to study the extensive menu. Here Marais excels, offering selections that appeal to the vegetarian and carnivore, which toy with the flavors of France and take advantage of the Italian food craze. What's more, there is a wide selection of wines by the glass matched to complement each dish. While pricey ($7), the wines were perfect.

Ignoring conventional wisdom to save the best for last, executive chef Jackson Kenworth offers the finest in presentation and taste from the very first course. The confit of duck leg with couscous pancakes ($7.50) was lean and delicious. It was served with sun-dried cherry and blood-red orange sauce that complements the crusty and spicy couscous. The shrimp wrapped in pancetta with couscous and artichokes ($9.75) was covered in a cream sauce light enough not to disturb the happy coupling of the shrimp and pancetta.

The crisp lobster wontons with ginger soy sauce ($8.50) avoided the doughy texture that often characterizes Chinese wontons. The fire-roasted dates stuffed with spicy sausage ($5.95) may not be for everyone, but the contrast between the sweet and the spicy flavors was delectable.

What about bread? Anyone who has been to Paris knows that there's no other place where bread tastes as good, but Marais comes pretty darn close. And for those in the mood for something sweeter, there's the delightful date-walnut bread.

The bread is as good as it gets here. The Caesar salad ($8) represents the other end of the spectrum. Why say it's a Caesar salad if it's covered with dry chicken strips? Call me a purist, but I prefer anchovies. And that's not the only departure from Caesar salad tradition. The sauce was not well-mixed, and the waiter did not offer fresh ground pepper. Finally, the sweet-corn soup with smoked chicken ($6.95) was flavorful despite an overdose of hot spice.

For the entrees, we selected the roasted lamb with wild mushroom tortellini ($17) and American Bouillabaisse ($18). The lamb was spectacular, and, except for the rich brown sauce and goat cheese-stuffed tortellini, it was lean enough to make the Weight Watchers diet plan. The Bouillabaisse, like the Caesar salad, was an experiment that didn't work. In the United States, any seafood stew in a red broth can be called bouillabaisse. But this abundant serving of fresh seafood would have fared better without the Middle Eastern couscous and hot spices.

For dessert, the chef offers a rich selection of toppers. But we settled on the "Plate of Nice Cookies." No, these cookies are not flown in from Nice. They're just nice cookies, and, like just nice people, a bit bland.

Overall, though, dining at Marais, if you get the right table, can be memorable, funky, flavorful and fun. And for those who go there for drinks and dancing, there's no better night on the town. ❑

The Original Great Chefs Taste Fair

In 1978 the National Kidney Foundation hosted the first Great Chef Taste Fair at the Sheraton Hotel in Boston. Since then, many organizations have tried to imitate Great Chefs but none have duplicated the magic that the Kidney Foundation creates. Over the past fifteen years, this event has become a vital part of the Boston's culture and remains the oldest culinary exposition in the city. Come celebrate, on Sunday, March 28, 1993 at 3 p.m. to 6 p.m., our 15th birthday. Sample some of the finest cuisine from New England's top restaurants and caterers, while enjoying entertainment from celebrity chefs and culinary demonstrations.

This year two attractions will be added to the line-up: "A Taste of New England" spotlighting homemade culinary products made in New England, and a silent auction containing chef's aprons signed by celebrities. The National Kidney Foundation of Massachusetts and Rhode Island, recipient of this benefit, is the only major voluntary health agency dedicated to the eradication of kidney diseases.

This event will be taking place at the John B. Hynes Memorial Convention Center, located at 900 Boylston Street, Boston at Prudential.

Admission is $15 (10 servings), $13.50 for senior citizens; children under 12 are free; bulk ticket discounts are available (MC/Visa/Check/MO).

IN VINO VERITAS

What a Wine List Should Be

BY JONATHON ALSOP

Until now, I've hesitated to write much about the world of restaurant wine lists because all I've had were complaints. First, there's the incomprehensible wine list that runs half the length of War and Peace, at twice the complexity of Finigan's Wake. Then there's the irrationally marked-up wine list that's a minefield of $3 and $5 wines for $18, right next to $12 and $15 wines priced at $20. Finally comes the annoying lean-and-mean wine list: four whites, three reds, one white Zinfandel, and a half-bottle of Italian dessert wine for $27, none of which you've heard of, or want to drink. Suffice it to say, ordering wine in most restaurants is nothing but a prime opportunity to get befuddled, look foolish, and end up ripped off.

Rather than pound out some screed against "Boston's WORST Wine Lists" and their wall-eyed concoctors (later, I promise!), I'll talk instead about the dinner we went to at On The Square in Watertown, where we learned by positive example from Marcia Bogue's wine list. It truly represents everything a wine list should be. Priced in exact proportion to the food menu, the wine list offers up options, safety, bargains and extremes. On The Square's wine list begins with the North American Collection (featuring, strangely, one Argentinean Chardonnay with some business relationship to Simi in California) and moves on to the European Collection; not too surprisingly, the North American side of the ledger is stronger and more affordable than the European side.

1990 Arrowood Vineyards Chardonnay ($32, but remember: that's wine list pricing) and 1990 Lolonis Chardonnay ($27) are dependable and tasty, and the Lolonis is especially good for a crowd paired with 1990 Lolonis Fume Blanc ($21). For something a little different, 1989 or 1990 Barnard-Griffin Chardonnay from Washington's Columbia Valley ($28) is one outstanding wine, big and creamy like a butter shortcake. Best of all, I happily paid more than $28 for the B-G in a Seattle restaurant two years ago. Good bargain alternatives are 1990 Hogue Cellars Semillon ($19) also from Washington, and 1989 Hermann J. Wiemer Dry Riesling ($21) from New York's Finger Lakes district.

The red end of the North American spectrum floats a couple of buys in 1990 Hedges Cabernet/Merlot blend ($20) and 1989 Columbia Merlot ($24), both from Washington. Things don't get hot until page three with 1989 Knudsen-Erath Pinot Noir ($23) and 1990 Sanford Pinot Noir ($24). 1990 Lolonis Zinfandel Reserve ($26) is a fantastic wine in a fantastic year, and you can't do any better than that. It's probably the single strongest wine on the list, from a quality/price perspective.

Once you transit to the European pages of On The Square's wine list, the prices go up about 35 percent; you may yearn for New World pricing, but there's no way around it. 1988 Latour Givry ($25) is a good deal on French Pinot Noir, and 1985 Latour Santenay ($35) has age and complexity on its side. Playing solid stand-by are two Vietti red wines from Italy: 1989 Dolcetto D'Alba ($23) and 1987 Nebbiolo D'Alba ($21).

Best of all, from a personal and sentimental perspective, is the 1935 Simi Zinfandel from California, my father's birth year. At $185, it remains untouchable until the big guy's 60th birthday, but it's still less than half the current retail price in California.

VOCAL ARTISTRY DOMINATES THE SUNDAYS

An Interview for Any Day of the Week

BY LUCY MITCHELL

Avalon was filled to capacity recently when a crowd, mainly students, sang, danced and generally showed their devotion to The Sundays, the English four-piece who have created a niche of their own within today's music market. Backstage before the gig, Harriet Wheeler and David Gavurin showed no signs of pre-performance nerves as they relaxed in jeans and docks and spoke about their music.

Despite the fact that they were at the end of a six week stint in the States, had completed a tour of Britain and Europe before Christmas, recently edited a video and hosted an MTV show, the two seemed full of enthusiasm and energy. David explained, "when things are going really well, somehow it doesn't feel exhausting." And things have been going well for these Londoners, who have sold out shows to rapturous audiences and received rave reviews in publications worldwide. In fact, it was only the night before that The Sundays played an unscheduled second gig in New York where they sold out and experienced one of their wildest shows so far. According to Harriet, this popularity gave them "as much confidence as we need to really relax and give it everything we've got . . . and perform . . . without the stupid little paranoias that can go through your head." The success of their first New York night was also, David felt, due to their own nerves combined with the audiences excitement, and "between the two there was a real sort of spark."

The cover to their recent album, Blind, is testimony to The Sundays talent for keeping it simple.

Audiences for them have been pretty uniform worldwide with no vast differences between Europe and America. Surprisingly enough for their music, these crowds are often far from serene; spectacles such as stage-diving and people being passed across on top of the crowd are not unusual. Although it may seem inappropriate for their music, David added "I don't think we've had one audience that hasn't been respectful." This unaffected pair did not always dream of touring, signing autographs and mingling with the paparazzi. After finishing their studies in Bristol, England, where they went to college, they spent a few years writing songs simply for their own amusement.

Eventually, after growing bored with Bristol they moved to London for a change of scenery. "We were just writing songs, with the vague idea that it would be nice to be in a band." As to the rise in their present popularity, it happened overnight. After forming The Sundays with friends Paul Brindley and Patrick Hannan, their first real gig was in London, in support of two other bands. A week later, the three music publications which often have the power to make or break a fledgling band, NME, Melody Maker and Sounds sang their praises. Soon the phone was ringing nonstop with offers from all the major record companies, and The Sundays had arrived. After signing with Geffen in 1989, reading, writing and arithmetic, a collection of song encapsulating their writing to this point, was released. More recently at the end of last year came blind, an album not quite as simple in instrumentation as their first release. Translating these studio recordings into live versions then presented itself.

The Sundays, it seems, dealt with this successfully although Harriet confessed that before the first gig of their British tour she had visions of the audience "looking aghast and filing out slowly."

A decision had been made not to fight the difference between the live and recorded versions of the songs and let them, as David said "work according to their own logic."

"As long as we keep the spirit there, the fact that certain parts of a song may be changed does not bother us." This self-assurance in their work has obviously helped them nurture their distinctive sound and despite being compared to artists varying from Suzanne Vega to Miles Davis, The Sundays have consistently followed their own path. In the early days, while writing songs together in Bristol, Harriet and David sometimes found themselves listening to their work, which was like no music in the charts or record stores and wondering whether this was a failing or flaw. Luckily, they were signed at this formative stage and realized that this fresh sound and innocent character was there special power. Later, on stage after their opening number the crowd cheered and Harriet looked out at them, at David and smiling said "Shall we sing another song?". ❑

PAUL MCCARTNEY
OFF THE GROUND

What's left to say about Paul McCartney? His record company biography describes him as "the most successful, awarded, and beloved songwriter and recording artist in the history of pop music," and even if half of that is true (which, in his rare case it probably is), then how is it possible to say anything bad about his new album?

Today's Paul McCartney, however, isn't what he used to be, and Off The Ground proves to be another firm reminder. The problem with criticizing Paul McCartney is that he can only be compared to himself (and maybe Mick Jagger, if you feel like rehashing all that controversy). In that respect, Off The Ground falls somewhere between 1989's Flowers In The Dirt and Press To Play (or any other studio album he's recorded in the last seven years). In other words, it has its moments, but its nothing monumental.

But when McCartney launches into one of his blatant pop specialties like "Off The Ground," "Hope Of Deliverance," or "Biker Like An Icon" his voice soars with the remembrance and sweet bliss that can transform any mediocre song of his into sheer brilliance. And the fact that the crack band that played on his last world-wide tour is accompanying him every step of the way certainly doesn't hurt. In fact, although the musicians are often found digging deep into their bags of clichés, they deserve as much credit as McCartney does for keeping Off The Ground from falling flat on its face.

THE NEW FAST AUTOMATIC DAFFODILS
ELECTRA RECORDS

The press release from the New Fast Automatic Daffodils calls their album Body Exit Mind one which "persuades by innuendo, that understands the power of mystery" and is "socially astute and peppered with art damage." Despite this somewhat confusing and, to say the least, pretentious description of their sound, the New F.A.D.'s radio-friendly single "Stockholm" has been getting a lot of airplay in Boston. On first hearing, Body Exit Mind it is not particularly impressive, but with a little time a few tracks make themselves felt. Promising are "Stockholm," definitely the pick of the lot, "Kyphos," a deceivingly slow track with strong bitter lyrics and "American Money," with the words "Give me one good reason why I shouldn't be myself again," seemingly the premise of the album. Despite the fact that they are natives of Manchester, England, the New F.A.D.'s are far from their raving predecessors and even claim to be anti-techno. This, their second album is a presentable collection from a band whose sound is a sound-bite of the music scene on the other side of the Atlantic.

THOMAS DOLBY

What may be more important than the songs on Dolby's new album are the musicians that contributed to it, and the way in which their playing was recorded. The album features bizarre, but well-placed guest appearances by Eddie Van Halen, Bob Weir, Jerry Garcia, Ofra Haza, Eddi Reader, Leland Sklar, and Budgie, all precisely recorded direct to computer disk without the use of moving tape. Once again, Dolby has conquered a technology that's ahead of his time and used it in the name of rock and roll.

It's been a long time since Dolby last released a full album and "Eastern Block" – the standout sequel to 1981's "Europa And The Pirate Twins" – is his way of updating us. The new improved version of this song intertwines a simple Bo Diddly beat with samples from the older song and views on European unification, as seen through the eyes of a distant unfulfilled love. The quaint story of "I Love You Goodbye" is sweetened with violins, accordions, and descriptive lyrics like, "I would never normally go bowling/On a Friday morning in New Orleans/but I like to come here to remember/The kind of places you took me." The rambunctious, jamming groove on "Silk Pyjamas" temporarily veers the album away from its serious side, describing a city girl transplanted to a town "with no underground train."

But the album isn't all smooth sailing. "Close But No Cigar" isn't as lucky as its title suggests, "Cruel" is only slightly redeemed by Eddi Reader's supple vocals, and "I Live In A Suitcase" is burdened by its lyrical premise, taken several steps too far. Still, in spite of its defects, Astronauts & Heretics is an addictive comeback for the deserving Dolby, even if the master of technology still has some things left to learn.

JESUS JONES

It's always hard for a band to follow up a successful album. Many a great band has fallen victim to the dreaded, career-ending "slump" when a follow-up album doesn't quite measure up to the original. Doubt, Jesus Jones' last album that unwittingly became the soundtrack for 1991 with its mega-hits "Right Here, Right Now" and "International Bright Young Thing" provides just such an opportunity to fail.

Thankfully, one listen to Perverse is all it takes to prove Jesus Jones is back – and harder than ever. Songs like "Zeroes And Ones" with its updated, pessimistic philosophy and revelations like, "This time the revolution/Will be computerized/Slip between reality/There's more to this than anything that you or I can see," show the darker side of the band while songs like "The Right Decision," and "The Devil You Know" with its paint-splattered video show the band can still write a club-happy hit.

The only drawback of Perverse is its lack of polish. Doubt was successful because it toned down the harsher sequences and antagonisms in a way that made the album easier for listeners to digest and remember. On Perverse, the band is in full force, with no temperament for pop radio. And while most listeners would have probably preferred the stronger melodies of Doubt instead of the harsher beats of Perverse, the album is still a welcome return for Jesus Jones.

STEPHEN ALBERT: VIOLIN CONCERTO; TREESTONE
ILKKA TALVI, VIOLIN
LUCY SHELTON, SOPRANO; DAVID GORDON, TENOR
SEATTLE SYMPHONY
NEW YORK CHAMBER SYMPHONY
GERARD SCHWARZ, CONDUCTOR

Much as David Del Tredici has drawn extensively on the works of Lewis Carroll as an impetus for his compositions, the late Stephen Albert found seeds of inspiration in James Joyce's arcane stream-of-consciousness. Like a good many composers of his generation, Albert had no use for the rigors of serialism, choosing instead a more accessible and immediate idiom. Treestone, a setting of extracts from Finnegans Wake, and the principal work on this release, is somewhat akin in tonal language to Stravinsky's "Song of the Nightingale." The violin concerto, a concise and economical work in one movement, recalls familiar gestures heard in a number of other 20th century concertos – Prokofieff comes to mind. Though some may view such music as merely derivative, Albert's music has proven itself in the most important arena – with audiences.

CHRIS KOWANKO
MORGAN CREEK RECORDS

With nine months still left in 1993, New York songwriter Chris Kowanko has quietly released what may end up being this year's most fascinating debut. With flawless production by Lenny Kaye and constantly changing musical styles, it's hard to imagine another new artist releasing an album this intriguing.

Inevitably, Kowanko's song writing and vocals will be compared to David Byrne, a fact made obvious as early as the second track: "My House" favors the jilting but simple rhythms and off-kilter vocal phrasing of the early Talking Heads. But Kowanko doesn't stand in one place for long, as each successive song proves itself unique. "Love Monster" is a soft, if slightly silly, folky tune about the fear of falling in love, while "Co-Star" nearly rocks. Other standouts include the Paul Kelly-like "Turn Me Down," where he entreats his lover to "Treat me as well as you would your cat," and the new single, "Grey Canyon," which is as close to conventional pop as Kowanko gets.

Although the mainstream music world will likely overlook this impressive first outing, Kowanko should be assured he won't be ignored for long.

DURAN DURAN
CAPITOL RECORDS

Who'd of thought? With one listen to "Too Much Information," the attentive listener will automatically be pleased with the first of a packed gathering of songs that make for a dramatic return of Duran Duran. Not only is Duran Duran (the second time they've used this title) their strongest album to date, but it also contains songs with actual meaning and purpose. Gone are the days of Rio, Girls on Film and Notorious. The new, improved Duran Duran, while maintaining a core unit of lead singer Simon Le Bon, keyboardist Nick Rhodes and guitarist John Taylor, means business. These songs are fun and interesting! Duran Duran is straightforward music and an improvement on the band's overproduced sound of the '80s. The group joins the '90s knowing that forward progression means something more than just a new look. "Too Much Information" is loud and driving, and harbors some bitterness toward an oversaturated MTV generation — but it's danceable, and even Le Bon's voice is capable of splitting its screaming strains. "Ordinary World," already a number one hit, lingers and laments in the past while searching for a place in today's world. It's a catchy, beautiful pop ballad, laced with melodic riffs reminiscent of "Grey Lady," an older, Le Bon-penned sailing song from 1985.

With "Come Undone," one listen is all it takes before realizing that these surviving members are not just back; they're back with their best. Duran Duran is fresh and balanced. Though it teases with hints of their past trademark pop hooks, missing are Nick Rhodes once-prominent keyboards — replaced instead with more of a guitar sound than anything else. And a line from Capitol's press information says it all: " . . . like the band's echoing name and encore album title, some things bear repeating." Welcome back!

HOTHOUSE FLOWERS
LONDON RECORDINGS

The third album from this band that was once given its break on U2's Mother label, establishes Hothouse Flowers as more than just a developing force in modern Irish rock. These guys are balladeers, storytellers and rockers rolled into one slick package. Songs From The Rain is a fluid, dreamlike journey through an emotional landscape that's peppered with images of self-reliance, spiritualism and hope. 'Rain is more than just another alternative-format album. Songs like "This Is It (Your Soul)," a hypnotic creation with a bent on isolating one's self for the sake of reaching the soul, spotlights the Flowers dedication to material that's anything but lighthearted. "One Tongue," an incredibly catchy pop song, is at once Brian Ferryesque and at the same time a happy-go-lucky plug for the future. With lyrics like "we have an answer in his language/ it might be silence it might be words . . . ," "One Tongue" is one of the best pop/alternative songs to come out in some time. Hothouse Flowers has come quite a way since the dance hit "Love Don't Work This Way." Songs From The Rain hits local stores on March 23 while the band will appear on the Letterman Show on March 17 and the Arsenio Hall Show on March 22. There's also speculation about a summer tour with Van Morrison.

ABOUT LAST NIGHT...

Yvonne's: Where The Elite Meet

BY LAUREN DARE A.K.A. THE LAST CALL LADY

Don't you get tired, especially at this purgatorial time of year, of standing in endless lines out in the freezing cold with snow blowing down your collar, waiting to get into a nightclub whose entrance is guarded by some beefy college football player with a one-syllable-words-only vocabulary? Worse, once you finally gain entrance, you must tussle for a position at the bar, or fight for a table with all the plebeian suburbanites who flood into the city every weekend in some kind of amateur attack on the "hot spots" of Boston.

Don't you wish instead that you could be greeted at the door of a plush, exclusive club by a sycophantic uniformed doorman (who, of course, knows your name), who ushers you immediately inside like a real VIP? And, once inside, wouldn't you happily rub shoulders with local celebrities like John Kerry (or Bob Crowe) in an atmosphere of high-powered see-and-be-seen schmoozing, feeling like you have finally made it into the Big Time of Boston night life? Then I have got the club for you.

Yvonne's – which is the nightclub alter-ego of that Boston bastion of old money, power and class, Locke-Ober's – offers night-life insider exclusivity for anyone who is both willing to pony up some cash for a year's membership, and who has the necessary social connections. After all, the whole point of having a private club is to screen out the riff raff, and like applying for a loan, Yvonne's requires references.

Now, your membership at Yvonne's will not get you elected to public office; it won't make you into an instant social or sexual success (though it might help) and it probably won't even get you free drinks at the bar. However, it will allow you to feel consummately superior to those around you the next time you're standing at some overcrowded bar, jostling with the hoi polloi, and you say (in a very loud voice reeking of sophisticated blasé attitude) "I'm so bored, there's absolutely nobody here tonight – let's go to Yvonne's."

Guaranteed your friends, companions and anybody who is in the immediate vicinity will gaze at you with a mixture of envy and awe: one of the privileged members of Yvonne's! Your status will attract non-member hangers-on who will instantly befriend you in order to get access inside, thus establishing your very own entourage, which is always impressive.

To say that Yvonne's is an exclusive, members-only club sounds very swank indeed. There are, and I'm not making this up, people who would willingly sacrifice a limb for a membership at this place. Never mind the fact that after the social smoke screen is blown away, it starts to filter through your star-stricken alcoholic consciousness that you are shooting pool and boogying on the postage stamp-sized dance floor with the same people you would encounter on a good night at Marais (or Zanzibar), and whom you were so desperately trying to escape in the first place.

However, if you can weasel your way past the membership committee, you will move up several notches on the food chain and gain some serious social advantages – enjoying the company of some of Boston's Beautiful People, being admitted freely into one of Boston's most luxurious nightclubs, experiencing the thrill of casually chatting with the aforementioned celebrities, and viciously name-dropping the next day – which is still good for something.

However, if, after doing Yvonne's to death in your first heady month of swinging with the "in" crowd, these advantages don't result in a complete epiphany in your social life (as evidenced by members of the opposite sex wantonly throwing themselves at you, name recognition on Beacon Hill, or your picture in the Boston Herald's "Inside Track"), don't blame me. Some people just aren't cut out for social celebrity status. ❑

BY ROCKIE GARDINER — MARCH 17 - 30, 1993

GENERAL FORECAST (If you know your ascendant, read it too)
The first of 1993's three squares between Saturn in Aquarius and Pluto in Scorpio is exact on the 19th, but these guys have been messing with our structure and security for a while — ask anyone who was in the World Trade Center the day Pluto, lord of the underworld, terrorism and plagues, turned retrograde. What's even more interesting is that this "nasty" square very closely aspects Clinton's and Tipper's 26 Leo Sun, Hillary's Part of Fortune, Al Gore's Venus-Chiron "heal the earth" polarity, the GOP's Saturn (shall they overcome?) and the USA moon at 26 Aquarius. Spring and the zodiacal new year arrives when the sun enters Aries Saturday morning, the 20th, at 9:41. The Vernal Equinox, the sacred turning point when night and day, dark and light, are equal, is a perfect time to stay up for sunrise, to spill your guts out and discover hidden spiritual resources no one knew you had. Mercury changes direction, from retrograde to direct, on Monday at 8:44 a.m. Since we felt the effects of Mercury going retrograde so much sooner than it actually happened, this change should hit us much earlier than Monday and heavier than usual. Drive defensively. The Aries new moon, exact Tuesday at 2:14 a.m. marks the monthly union of lunar and solar energy and the real beginning of the rambunctious Aries cycle. Watch the heat and your temper rising — Venus and Mars, femmes and dudes, square off Thursday.

ARIES (MARCH 20-APRIL 19)
New year, new moon, new Aries energy to revitalize the etheric body and infuse the physical with red hot desire. Make an early birthday wish at the new moon so you'll be totally focused on your goal and well on your way to achieving it when your day arrives. Love, friendship and the cost of maintaining them can become big deals. Don't push credit limits any further; they're not the hidden resources waiting to be uncovered; check out a neighbor's offer instead.

TAURUS (APRIL 20-MAY 20)
Stern Saturn in your midheaven testing Pluto in your marriage house may mean that your sweetie is being offered a more responsible position or becoming a bigger burden. Saturn bestows both respect and dreary respectability. As Pisces fades away, you could turn into a weekend recluse, infected by spring fever and a deep need to lay down and replenish psychic energy. Don't fall for someone's authority or guilt trip simply because it's too much effort to fight back. Next week you roar back, a raging Bull.

GEMINI (MAY 21-JUNE 20)
New moon magic, a ceremony of sorts, should be made if you're at all concerned about a gig, your boss or a parent. Not that bad things will happen if you forget, but so much else is going on while your Mercury ruler is changing direction that unless you focus on something outside yourself, you'll wind up in a dither, tossed by planetary energies no one can comprehend right now, much less predict. A fight with a friend over money or a prized possession is looming. An unavoidable test of values or loyalty?

CANCER (JUNE 21-JULY 22)
Your finest moments come during the Aries new moon when good intentions can be directed to a specific end, not blown on amorphous generalities. Since Aries rules your midheaven, your place in the world, visualize yourself making a bold career move or a journey to fulfill a life-long goal. Who knows what else will contrive to get you there: the woman, artist or art director who provokes a confrontation and your rage next Thursday, the truth-seeker whose passion ignites your own hot times ahead.

LEO (JULY 23-AUGUST 22)
Your dissatisfaction with a working relationship, a heavier sense of responsibility toward your partner or your frustration with the establishment can become too much to bear with customary leaning grace. Whatever occurs won't be the first explosive situation of 1993, but it might shake you up enough to do something about it. July Leos are not as bothered as those born in mid-August, but all of you get to explore new possibilities during Aries, new territory too. And everybody pays handsomely for the privilege. Would you have it any other way?

VIRGO (AUGUST 23-SEPTEMBER 22)
Mercury turning direct can mess up travel plans or play weird games with the car, same as when it's turning retrograde. It'll help to have another sign (not Gemini!) drive over the weekend. Try to concentrate on the details of any deal or purchase which may safely be signed , sealed or delivered starting Monday, although it can't hurt to have a few days grace to absorb the energies of the ambitious Aries new moon. Marriage, partnerships, your agent and attorney will clamor for your attention which seems to be drifting as we speak.....

LIBRA (SEPTEMBER 23- OCTOBER 22)
A window in the workaday world opens enough for you to streamline your technique, cut through red tape and collect more money. Kids can cost big bucks, so might your fun. Anxiety, frustration, maybe a broken bone may result from difficult planetary aspects, but you won't be resigned to sigh and suffer in silence. When fiery Mars squares your Venus ruler midweek, you're angry enough to balk or walk. The new moon also sharpens your wits when you're with co-workers and health professionals; you won't take their crap.

SCORPIO (OCTOBER 23-NOVEMBER 21)
Additional pressure from the landlord, parents or folks you live with. Home can feel more like home plate, so near and yet so far. What you need is a hit, a little success in the classroom, on stage or in bed, which might happen any time you realize Spring has sprung, it's another season and there's very good reason to make something happen. The Aries new moon activates your house of pleasure, sports and creativity, the fun you have and the risks you'll take so you can score.

SAGITTARIUS (NOVEMBER 22- DECEMBER 21)
Home is where the bucks are and where they're supposed to be spent. As the sun supports your erratic money situation, the thought of receiving a sudden windfall from the family won't seem so misguided, and no one has to die. Maybe dad sends you the Steinway, maybe Mom hands you an Apple. You'll have an abundance of enthusiasm for whatever is offered, even if it doesn't make it through the door for a while. Remember that the days before Mercury's change of direction are often more troublesome than the day (the 22nd) itself. The energy in the neighborhood can be oppressive: avoid dark alleys and dumpsters.

CAPRICORN (DECEMBER 22-JANUARY 20)
Springing into action, despite warning signs from a friend and colleague? You may have had it up to here with all authority, even your own opinion and expertise, but this is not the time to mess with forces that are firmly entrenched, particularly those that control the construction industry. Reforms come soon enough, but right now compliance is the safer route. Mercury's change of direction in our money house makes buying and selling stuff tricky, at least until the middle of next week. Double-check prices and credit card receipts.

AQUARIUS (JANUARY 21-FEBRUARY 18)
The pressure to pop your pop or reveal a dastardly secret about your boss peaks this week. If need be, split for another location and circumvent phone calls while Mercury is changing direction. You could inadvertently slip up and force a confrontation that is not advantageous at the present time; later in the year, maybe. The new moon brings new money or an object you suddenly crave. As for lovers, they can look remarkably like your siblings friends. Ah spring, when everything seems possible once again.

PISCES (FEBRUARY 19-MARCH 19)
Is it art or artifice, a sale or a sellout? While Mercury changes direction in your sign, both sides of every issue can look equally attractive and justifiably doable. More Piscean duality until the Aries new moon kicks in and you (and the rest of us too) begin to aim at something worthwhile instead of scattering shots willy-nilly. Or at Hilly-Billy. Politics plays a part in the spring scenario, but first pass through wardrobe and makeup to refine your outward appearance. A nip here, a tuck there?

Of course you should have a right to be yourself, to wear what you'd like and act as you'd like; but insecurity demands stereotypes. You'll have to express yourself in the closet because the risks are too high.

My Dearest Eve,
You incorrigible wretch! Die! Die! like the useless schizoid freak you are! Hmm, let's see — huge debts, bad credit, no degree, brain damage . . . I've got nothing! 15 months with you was a slow descent into mental degradation. I only pray that I get run over by a truck tomorrow. You suck!!!

What can I say? It's been really great working with you. It will be even better working without you.thanks to the ten percent. Right? Best of luck, Mr. Smartguy.

Billy (Dr. Bontempi),
If you haven't noticed, I floss for you everyday. When I sit on your dentist's couch, I wish it was a four post bed floating through a rainbow and all that's on the bed is me, you, my lust and your hot bod. If you were made of sugar, I'd eat you up (starting you know where) just to have you look at my cavities. Make your move mister tonsil tickler.

Sweetheart,
I loved last weekend. You weren't there. I love Vermont. You don't know how to find it. I love your hair. It gives me a laugh. I love your walk. It's fun to watch your fat jiggle. I love the smell of spring flowers. They clear my nostrils of your putrid reek. Thanks for knowing me — you've made me appreciate the finer things in life.

Randy,
If I had a pony, I'd ride it by your office with a razor in my hand and shave off your cheeseball beard. It looks like a graffiti artist went wild with a can of black spraypaint and glued some random pubes on your mug.

P.S. Close your blinds — nobody enjoys seeing your semi-nude torso lounging in bed.

You may be lounging in the sun while I am trapped in the cold, but rest assured that I will have the last laugh. There's a box full of disks on their way to you at school. Their contents are guaranteed to drive your G.P.A. into the ground.

Ernest,
I hate you with each and every one of my years.

To the almighty butt-sniffin' Trev-dog-
Welcome home, Dorothy. Kansas hasn't been the same without you. Everyone is up in arms over Bert & Ernie getting tossed in the clink. Too bad you missed it. Big plans for this week. When you do have to click your heels and say "There's no place like Mississippi," it will have been a week well spent. Avoid people down there who encourage you to 'squeal like a pig'. They're only after one thing. Get some shoes while you're here and impress friends and family when you return to the war-ravaged South. See you in hell....

Bobby-
Congratulations buddy. No more point-system at school. I am proud of you. You are one of the best basketball players I have ever seen. Keep playing, little man.

Did anyone ever tell you that you are stark raving mad? They have? Oh your husband does regularly? I rest my case.

Alli my Dear,
I have a confession to make. While you were away I ate your poodie. But don't worry. I replaced him with an exact duplicate. By the way he was delicious.

By Bread Alone, Thinly

Why is it that diets seem so much more magic and meaningful if they come from Europe? Do they have an allure paralleling that of actual fattening European food? This method (and it's not only useful for dieting) consists simply of eating a kind of bread called Malsovit and, with reference both to the Bible and to correctional institutions, focusing on it, while drinking lots and lots of water. The usual other healthy foods can supplement the Malsovit (chicken, citrus fruits, raw or steamed vegetables etc.) but it's those seven slices that are the essential thing. The bread is low in fat and high in dietary fiber, it provides complex carboydrates, complete protein, oat bran, B-vitamins, iron and potassium. On the other hand, it contains no cholesterol or sugar, and of course no preservatives. Malsovit has a very dense, chewy, and one might even swear molasses-y quality, though that is of course the very last thing it would have in it. There is no denying that a slice of Malsovit, slowly chewed, delivers the sensation that there's a lot of something going on in the tum; truly, it is filling. And with the glass of water you'll be having before, and after, the bread – going up to a minimum of eight glasses of water per day – the whole experience is busy-bee-ish, less wan and witholding than some diets. The brochure claims that the stricter, bread-only form of the diet will rid you of two to six pounds per week. A modified version of this diet asks you to eat a slice of Malsovit – with the usual river of water running around it – 30 minutes before a meal, assuring that you will arrive already somewhat pre-satisifed. At around $3.50 it's more expensive than most bread, but far more productive (or rather, reductive).

The Bureau That Ate Cambridge

The 'organic' bit is a wry nod to the earthy realness of this place, which exudes a thrift shop atmosphere, selling beds and bureaus instead of trailing skirts and bandanna tops. Before you take a more conventional shopping trip for wooden furniture, come here and stroll around and around the neat rows of tables, dressers, drop-leaf tables, wardrobes, acres of chairs, bureaus. china closets, sideboards, entire dining-room sets, cedar chests, standing lamps that look like they're out of old movies, mirrors, Duncan Phyfe tables with splayed legs, and sometimes gorgeously kitschy art (maidens heroically stretching forth next to waterfalls in a late 19th century MTV surrealism for instance) and old stitched samplers. The era is pre-1950, and depending on your age, you may have seen these sturdy pieces in your grandmother's house, doing time between eras of chic in an attic, or at a cottage by the lake. Maybe it's the ornate old foot-pedal organ for sale here, but many of the pieces – while only pretending to solid utilitarian values – have interesting finishes, aggressive bulges, a comic ornateness. And some (especially the tables with interesting fluted legs and/or claw-foot features, or decorative spoon-carved ornaments) are downright beautiful, and would cost a lot more somewhere else. The distinctive hippie yesteryear atmosphere, the unassuming way that a real find can be really found, and the low prices are your three reasons to come here. But only Saturdays from 10-5, September through June.

Relaxed Semi-Date, For and at Eight

Imagine a dinner party with an apparently invisible hostess, a gathering in which this ectoplasmic entertainer has been the behind-the-scenes force. Carol Bednarz brings together people – four women and four men – whom she hopes (indeed she knows because she has arranged it this way) will have some important things in common, and sends them off to a restaurant together. The matches she may be very loosely making pertain to the mesh and weave of the whole group – a good dinner party in which easygoing connections may be made – that's one goal. Naturally, if two people hit it off – or, as has happened, if all the men end up asking out one or all of the women that's in the scheme too. Carol Bednarz, who says 'I never dated well,' wanted to make it easier for other people, and so has been arranging these Friday dinners (held at interesting, off-the-beaten-track, comfortable, talkable restaurants) for seven years now. The words she uses most - after "college-educated" and "professional" - to describe the people she screens and combines is "nice, pleasant personalities." Among the serendipitous possibilities – given the cats' cradle of combinations afforded by the format – are that women can make friends with other women, men with men, and Platonic friendships can develop too. One non-romantic couple who met at Table For Eight traveled around the world together. Business deals have been struck; people have found lawyers, accountants, etc. And okay, okay, yes people have also fallen in love and gotten married after (way after) dinner. Each person goes Dutch; the fee for the service is $45 for one week. Though, when another bundle that pulls the simpatico together (same interests; same decade) comes along, one can dine again, and again.

6 All-Out Work Out

Summer's coming, bringing with it shorts and beaches, Newport and swimsuits. Feeling unworthy of that bikini? Afraid to even look at those tank tops? Shape up (or ship out, to somewhere like Alaska, where it never truly gets warm)! Work that body, pump up the jam, shake it 'til it falls off. It's now or never. How to lose that poundage? What health clubs to try? The latest in the world of workouts? Read onward. By Chad Sanborn

He's battled fame. He's battled Ulf Samuelson. But now, all those fights seems small potatoes as Bruin Cam Neely fights a career-threatening knee injury. He's back on the ice...but for how long? An real-life Improper interview with one of Boston's favorite sports heroes.

Improperly Yours

Mim Michelove

It's scary how quickly you become used to meeting "celebrities:" local heroes, national stars. It's not that you're necessarily blasé about it. After all, this isn't Hollywood. And I'm not going to kid you; sometimes, it's fun. Sometimes, intimidating. Seldom what you expect and, on average, somehow disappointing.

Because you want them to be special, the way the characters they play are. You don't want them to act like everyone else, because they're not. You expect them to be bigger, better, larger than life. It's easy to forget that they're just people, with good days and bad days, good sides and bad sides.

But occasionally, you encounter someone who is a pro; they knows how to work the media without "working" them; able to be oblige without being insincere or arrogant. Cam Neely is a natural pro, which made observing him a pleasure. First, backstage at a charity event, watching him relax, checking out the action with brews and Bruin buddies. Next, at the interview; he's ready for the questions, but quiet, polite.

Finally, at the cover photo shoot: accommodating as always, but after he had his fighting armor on, tensing, as if waiting for the high sticking that usually follows. That punch you see about to happen on our cover actually, for one second, almost did. His uniform, his injury, the mood, who knows? But for one moment, Cam Neely was acting, and acting with real pent-up sound and fury. I know the guy in the Grim Reaper costume was sweating.

Improperly yours,

AROUND TOWN

Remember all the way back to 1988? Things sure were different then. Reagan was president, and, more importantly, there was no Roxy nightclub. Well, now we have a Democrat in the White House, and the Roxy is gearing up for its 5th Anniversary celebration. After a brief stint as pure-country Silverado, Boston's glam club is back, with a bang. The festival starts on Thursday, April 1 from 6 to 11 p.m., with a benefit for the Friends of Boston's Long Island Shelter; tickets are $35 in advance, $40 at the door.

On April 2 at 7 p.m., the party continues with a live performance by Grammy-winning bluesman Buddy Guy, and beginning April 3, every Saturday will feature the White Heat Swing Orchestra and the Roxy Dancers. Fear not, country lovers – the Roxy will also have country music every Thursday night beginning April 8. And to cap off their new line up, Friday nights, beginning April 2, will be Techno night at the Roxy. Call 227-ROXY for tickets and information.

They're not only talking baseball, they're photographing it. That's right, sports fans, the snow's melting (finally) and the grass is greening, and that can mean only one thing: the boys of summer are coming. What better way to get prepared for a season of America's pastime then attend an some exhibitions of baseball photography? On April 2, from 5-7, the Photographic Resource Center will host an opening reception for John Weiss' exhibit, "The Face of Baseball." This show will run until June 30, when it leaves for Cooperstown. Also opening on April 2 at the Photographic Resource Center will be Striking Images, a group show which will include collections of photographs, baseball cards, and memorabilia, and also the Boston unveiling of Norman Rockwell's The Dugout. Call the PRC at 353-0700 for information.

Five short nights are the only opportunity you will get to see "Catskills on Broadway," the fun-loving comedy which won the Outer Critics Circle Award for Outstanding Broadway Comedy. This show, which is taking over the Colonial Theatre (106 Street) for a limited engagement, focuses on the humor of the Catskills Mountains region. Shows run Tuesday, April 13 through Sunday, April 18. Performances at 7 p.m. Tuesday, 8 p.m. Wednesday through Saturday; 2 p.m. Thursday and Saturday, and Sunday at 3 p.m. Tickets are $32.50-$47.50. Call 931-2787 for tickets and information.

As a young man during the Depression era, Henry Brant took to composing works that he describes as having "comic ingredients, echoes of the circus, the dance hall and of street music, more or less glossed-over horseplay." Still active at eighty, Brant will join Richard Pittman and the Boston Musica Viva, playing piano, percussion, tin fife and harmonica in three of his picaresque musical escapades, including the Marx Brothers, written in 1938. Also on the program are two of his recent works that exploit spatial relationships among instruments. Henry Brant: Music From the Great Depression to the Great Recession can be heard at the Longy School's Pickman Hall in Cambridge on Friday, April 2. The concert begins at 8 p.m. but advanced ticket-holders are invited to a 7 p.m. screening of Henry Brant's film styled after the Marx Brothers. Call 353-0556 for tickets and information.

"Auction:" from the Latin "auc" meaning to hock, sell, transact, and "tion," meaning...well, that's not important right now. What is important is that on April 2 at 7:30 The Art Institute of Boston will sponsor a live auction of over 100 works by noted artists. The funds raised for this event, which will take place at Grogan & Co. and will be emceed by WBZ-TV's Uma Pemmaraju will be used to establish "Multicultural Access," a scholarship fund to improve arts educational access for disadvantaged and minority students. Along with works by artist such as Annie Leibowitz, Frank Gehry, Peter Falk (that's right, Columbo), and a Polaroid replica of Renoir's "Chrysanthemums" the night will feature food from a roster of Boston's top chefs. Auction catalogues and tickets are $20 per person. For tickets and information call 262-1223.

As you age, time speeds forward almost as rapidly as your maturing gut expands. And, like gravity's pull on sagging buttocks, nothing can halt time's march, nor defend against its damaging effects on your physical person. Nothing, of course, except fighting it like hell.

Remember about two months ago? The new year was dawning (yes, it's been two months already). You were teetering around that party, spilling cheap champagne on someone's carpet and shooting off your mouth about how '93 was going to be the year you got back in shape. "Really," you insist, "I'm planning on losing these love handles, doing the Marky-Mark washboard-stomach thing. You know."

Assuming you even made the effort to keep such a noble (though half-hearted) promise to yourself chances are you've since exhibited a serious lack of commitment. Psychiatrists call it suppression. Workout gurus call it laziness. Fundamentalist Christians call it backsliding. No matter what you call it, sport, the fact is: you quit.

As March gets underway, the time is right for beginning again or, if you never even attempted to put your money where your mouth resides, simply beginning. Sure, initiating a workout regime a few months into the new year lacks symmetry. Yes, it would be more symbolic to host a mental ground-breaking on January 1 to celebrate the reconstruction of your physical and psychological existence, thus rendering the first day of the year as the first day of the rest of your life (if you do join a health club, be prepared for such sanguine bromides). But that time has passed and the first day of 1994 is too far away. Your gut will only become chubbier by then. There is no better time than the present. Just do it. No pain, no...you get the idea.

When a car needs repair, you call on a mechanic. When a basement floods, you call Roto Rooter. When you feel the need to throw a party, get stinking drunk and ride in go-carts for charity, you join the Shriners. And when you want to get in shape, you join a health club.

Like tofu wieners, all health clubs seem to offer the flavor of bland similarity. Catering mostly to health-concerned professionals, the clubs' indistinct taste is rooted in a commonplace recipe: a pinch of free weights, a dash of machine weights, a lot of mirrors and the stench of locker room camaraderie. For instance, almost every club boasts several aerobics programs. Transcending the traditional concept of aerobic classes, these programs include such trendy mutations as step aerobics, low-impact, low/high impact combination, Cardio Funk and a mind-numbing litany of additional variations that push the boundaries of what aerobics can be.

And, of course, there are weights. All health clubs offer Nautilus machines, or a

No Pain, No Gain, No Waiting

By Megan Gilmartin

The motto "no pain, no gain" may sound impressive when you've just finished an aggressive workout and you're standing there pickled in your own sweat; however, it is a motto that's creating many injuries among those who have joined the fitness-crazed nineties. Bostonians in pursuit of the perfect body are keeping Scott Waugh and his team of physical therapists at Prescription Orthopedic Sports Therapy Clinic "very busy." While frenetically trying to tighten their buttocks and trim the fat from their waistlines, these exercisers are also managing to accrue quite a few injuries along the way.

No Gain With Pain

"Overuse," Scott explains, is the most common form of injury. People, he says, are led to believe that they should work out until it hurts; however, this is not a good method of monitoring your body's response to exercise. "When you feel pain," Scott says, "It is your body's way of telling you to stop." In other words, a "good" workout should not leave you lame.

After Scott and his team evaluate and treat an injury, they brief their patients on ways to prevent injuries from happening again. The sports clinic says that "proper flexibility" is the most effective way to avoid injuries. You've heard it time and time again, but it's true: taking time to stretch-out your muscles before and after a tough workout is vital to maintaining a safe and healthy exercise program.

PERSONAL SHAPING

You want to join in the fitness race, but you just can't seem to get your hand off the remote control and out of the potato chip bag. You want to "Just Do It," but your body just can't seem to rouse itself off the couch . You want to take whatever disposable income you may have and invest it in a membership at the local gym instead of a stool at the local bar, but you don't want anyone to see your sinful shape. If these anxieties sound familiar to you, we may be able to offer you a remedy: a personal trainer.

"A lot of people don't like to exercise," says Carla Morilla, a personal trainer specializing in sports conditioning and home fitness. "Some people need to have an appointment, otherwise, they're not going to do it." Carla feels that a personal trainer is able to push a person to exercise harder than they would normally do own their own. She also modifies and customizes each work-out to fufill each clien's goals and needs. "With a personal trainer," says Carla, "You're getting proper instruction and education on fitness and wellness."

If you love the idea of a personal trainer, but are afraid of the dependency side-effects, don't be. "The ultimate goal with a client, " says Carla, "is to get them to exercise on their own."

WORKING TO WORK YOU OUT

close facsimile thereof, and free weights. Most health clubs in Boston also offer nutritional advice, weight-loss counseling and a myriad of computerized machines simulating bicycle riding, stair climbing, cross-country skiing, running and the forgotten, less-glamorous exercise of walking.

But representatives from the clubs discussed in this article – just a random sample of the many Boston-area health clubs – vehemently lack individuality. Interestingly, when asked what distinguishes their respective health clubs from the other Boston-area clubs, each representative said their personal attention was focused on their clients. As Jack Lemmon's desperate, anything-to-close-a-deal character in the movie Glengarry Glenn Ross advised, "Always be selling."

Salesmanship and recurring unique, personalized service aside, each club does possess distinctive features separating it from the others as dramatically as separating heart-clogging egg yolks from the whites. These are the attributes that will guide you to a health club, one suiting your needs and setting you on the road to fitness. And more importantly, keeping you on that road.

To build an enduring fitness program, beginners should refrain from starting out "all gung-ho," says Donna Wroblewski of Gold's Gym, reflecting the changes undertaken by this national chain of health clubs. Once home to the muscle-headed body building embodied by scary, pseudo-comedian cum protein-pitchman Joe Piscopo, Gold's is now a more complete health club offering aerobics classes, saunas and a less intimidating atmosphere.

The mere presence of men, be they walrus-necked or pencil-necked, can be intimidating, claims Kelly Smith. Which explains why Boston Fitness for Women, where she is a fitness director, caters to women only. Located downtown, at 27 School Street for more than 16 years, the club offers a safe haven from the traditionally macho workout environment.

"Some women can be intimidated by the maleness factor," she explains. "These women are not into the pick-up scene and some of the women are in various states of conditioning. They're less inclined to try new things, especially weights, if there are guys hogging the benches. And (the club) is clean, clean, clean, clean here."

The majority of the club's membership is made up of professionals, ranging in age from 20 to 80 years old, many making the time to workout while maintaining a busy schedule. To encourage commitment to the workouts, Smith says that she advises new members to "continuously set realistic goals and realize that what is in magazines is not real life."

Time management is also a major issue for members of The Boston Sports Club, says Ray Dewirst, assistant manager. Overlooking Copley Square from its 561 Boylston Street address, The Boston Sports Club offers the usual workout equipment and programs as well as "circuit workouts." Alternating between cardiovascular exercises and strength equipment, circuit workouts are designed for busy people who want a well-balanced workout but can invest only about an hour, says Dewiest.

Those with the time could spend all day at the Boston Athletic Club, located about a mile from downtown Boston at 653 Summer Street. According to Cliff Seeto, director of operations, the Boston Athletic Club is one of Boston's larger health club facilities, and augments the usual weight machines and aerobics programs with indoor tennis and basketball courts, yoga, chiropractic care, nutritional advice, a Roman bath, laundry service, and, probably most attractive, parking. The club also runs a workout program for kids that is designed to "build active children," Seeto says. And, no doubt, keep the hyper tots occupied while mom and dad train.

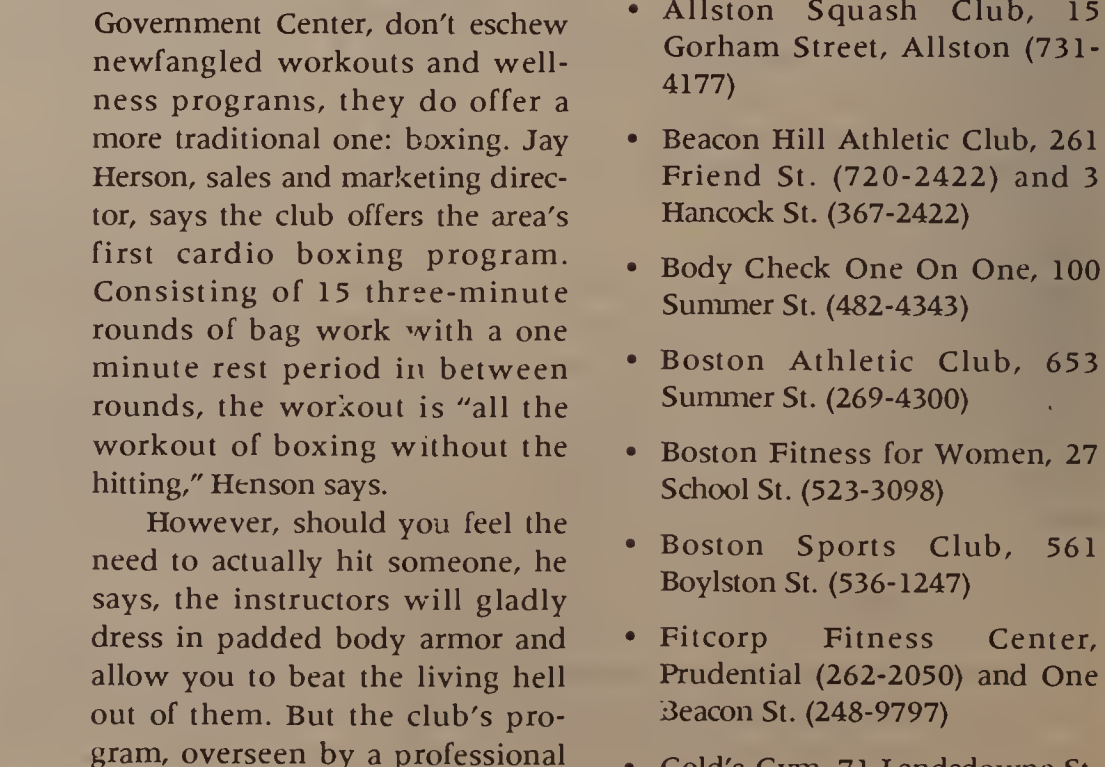
With a panoramic view of the Financial district from its location on the 27th floor at 100 Summer Street, it's no surprise Body Check One On One caters more to professional types than Raffi groupies. Kim Spertner, a marketing representative, says the club is "designed to accommodate busy executives and professionals." To streamline the process as much as possible, the club is implementing a new "personal wellness" program, as Spertner puts it, that is guided by computer software. Taking into account such criteria as physical characteristics, fitness levels and nutrition, the software advises the user on types and intensities of workouts.

Fitcorp Fitness Centers incorporate physical fitness into an overall philosophy of personal wellness, claims Dave Harshbarger, director of Fitcorp at The Prudential Center. "We're concerned more with our members' total wellness, with fitness only being one part of that," he says. "But we also emphasize nutrition, stress management and weight control."



As its name indicates, Fitcorp caters to companies as well as individuals, offering corporate rates and the option of having Fitcorp staffers travel from one of its Boston-area clubs to member-company sites where they conduct wellness programs, such as cholesterol and blood pressure screenings.

whoever your having problems with, on the bag. It's great," enthuses Herson.

In addition to the pure joy of giving your boss' pug a severe pounding, working out has several other merits. You look better. You feel better. You may even live longer, though don't ask running fanatic/author/premature corpse Jim Fixx about that. But nothing will happen until you start working out. Until then, continue to watch time pass you by as gravity tugs.

Author Chad Sanborn currently sweats his bod at Fitcorp.

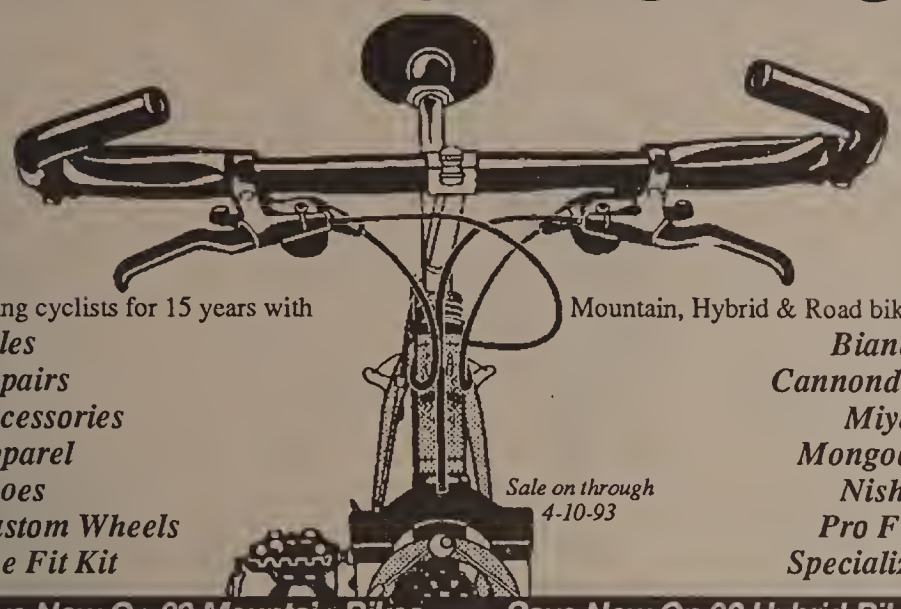
Workouts for women: Boston Fitness for Women provides a comfortable workout without worrying about competition with the boys.



Although the Beacon Hill Athletic Club's two locations, 261 Friend Street, near North Station and 3 Hancock Street near Government Center, don't eschew newfangled workouts and wellness programs, they do offer a more traditional one: boxing. Jay Herson, sales and marketing director, says the club offers the area's first cardio boxing program. Consisting of 15 three-minute rounds of bag work with a one minute rest period in between rounds, the workout is "all the workout of boxing without the hitting," Henson says.

However, should you feel the need to actually hit someone, he says, the instructors will gladly dress in padded body armor and allow you to beat the living hell out of them. But the club's program, overseen by a professional boxer, consists mostly of bag work. "If you're having a bad week you can picture your boss, or

An Improper Interview with Cam Neely, Modest Hero

By Susanne E. Schantz

First of all, you have to know that Cameron Neely, age 27, is exactly as he appears in all those countless television interviews: this Bruin is polite, quiet and huge. Not quick to open up, and yet as straightforward as they come, Cam is none of the things you expect from a sports hero. No sign of cockiness, no hint of grandiosity. If you didn't know better, you would say he's just an average Joe. Only difference is, Cam Neely is everything but average.

> "If I walk into a place where I don't really know anybody and I become the center of attention, it's hard for me to deal with. I can't take that situation and turn it around so I feel comfortable."

Since his career-threatening, well-documented knee injury back in 1991, Cam has been splitting his time between sports therapy, trying to rehab his knee, and helping his brother Scott with their new business venture, American Golf Tournaments. Watching Neely sit in his office is a little like watching a bull in a china shop. Dressed in a baseball hat, jeans and a tee-shirt which says, ironically enough, "The Image Is You," Cam doesn't look terribly comfortable in his sparse office.

But after a few minutes, and after plopping his legs up on the desk in front of him, Cam relaxes, and talks about his life. Naturally enough, the first topic of conversation is his knee, which he pats as he talks, and his new business.

CAM: This golf project is something that I'm interested in; it's also a business, which excites me. When I'm done playing, I really would like to make my choice of what I want to do, and I like the idea that this will really grow and be enjoyable at the same time.

You know, when I first broke into the league 10 years ago, guys a little older would say to me, 'Cam, prepare yourself for life after hockey. It's gonna end. It goes by really quick.' And, at eighteen, I was like, 'Yeah, yeah, yeah, okay, sure, sure, no problem. Thanks for the advice.' Ten years later, I'm sitting here going, 'Man, it does go by really, really quick.'

IB: Do you fear that day coming when it's just too much stress on your knee to play any more?

CAM: Not really. I mean, it has crossed my mind at times, especially this year. February of "92 is when I had my first knee surgery; the doctor said it was possibly career threatening, which freaked me out. I'd say from February until probably late October there was a lot of doubts if I could come back and play. And I still was very positive. I did everything I was told to do, and worked as hard as I could. But until you get on the ice to try, you really don't know.

IB: Do you harbor any resentment towards Pittsburgh's Ulf Samuelson [the perpetrator of a serious leg injury] ?

CAM: You know, I've said this time and again, I don't respect the way he plays, I don't like the guy, but what caused all this [points at his knee]...yeah, sure, he was involved, but it wasn't anything done intentionally. I know what's done intentionally. What a lot of people were showing time and again was the hit that I didn't respect, and I think that type of hit can really end people's career, but that was a different leg. I just don't respect the way he plays. That's the bottom line, really.

IB: What's your relationship like with your teammates?

CAM: Well... when you play and travel with the team it's a lot different. When I went on the trip with the team before I played, it was great for me, because that's when you really get to know guys. Every October, when the circus comes to town, our circus goes out. But it's not as glamorous as people think, traveling to all these cities. I mean, we're in and out of cities so fast we don't even know where we are half the time. You basically see a hotel, see a restaurant, a bar or maybe a movie theater, that's all you see in the city...and the arena obviously. Obviously, it can wear on you: the travel, the time away from home, the married guys away from the wives and kids. The road's great, but it can be tedious and tiresome.

IB: Do you have any friend on the team that you consider to be more than just a teammate?

CAM: I gotta say, since L.B. [Lyndon Byers], one of my best friends, is not around anymore, I've really been having a tough time getting to know the other guys because I haven't been around that much. We have a lot of great guys but it's tough to really get to know them until I play and travel with them.

IB: What bugs you about some of the people you meet?

CAM: A lot of people, I think, get this

"A lot of fans are on that same emotional ride that players are on. If we win, they're happy; if we lose, they're pissed."

"For as long as I've been out and the severity of [my injury], in the back of my mind, before I started playing again, I think, 'this could be career-ending.' It takes its toll on you, mentally."

wrong image of me...I mean, when I came here I knew one person. I didn't know anybody on the team. And all of a sudden, my career took off. I'd walk down the street and people would say 'Hey, Cam,' and I'd say 'Whoa!' It was very weird for me to deal with at first...I was 21 when I came here and very shy. In a lot of ways, I'm still shy and I'm uncomfortable in places where I don't really know anybody. And if I walk into a place where I don't really know anybody and I become the center of attention, it's hard for me to deal with. I can't take that situation and turn it around so I feel comfortable, but I like going out to places where there is a lot of people.

A lot of people might see my shyness, or not [being] really very outgoing, as being a snob or kinda stuckup or something, and that's the furthest from the truth. I'm not one of these people that has 300 close friends. I mean, I have a small group of friends that I really feel comfortable with and love to hang out with.

IB: You seem to handle people swarming all over you.

CAM: I can handle it when it's one-to-one or kids, or anybody coming up and wanting to talk for a few minutes. But sometimes, you know, people tend to maybe go over the line a little bit and really think that they're buddies with me. A lot of fans are on that same emotional ride that players are on. If we win, they're happy, if we lose, they're pissed. I think sometimes they feel a lot more a part of us and what we do, which I can understand. But there's times when somebody might want to talk to you for 20 minutes, and I don't want to talk about hockey for 20 minutes with somebody I don't really know.

IB: Any feelings on how much longer you're going to play?

CAM: Well, I think that if I can maintain the strength in my leg, my knee will hold up. I really believe that. But anything can happen. I try to just really enjoy the day that I'm in. Everybody can enjoy the present a lot more than they do. But I want to quit on my terms, not when an injury tells me, or when someone says, 'Cam, you're not good enough to play anymore.'

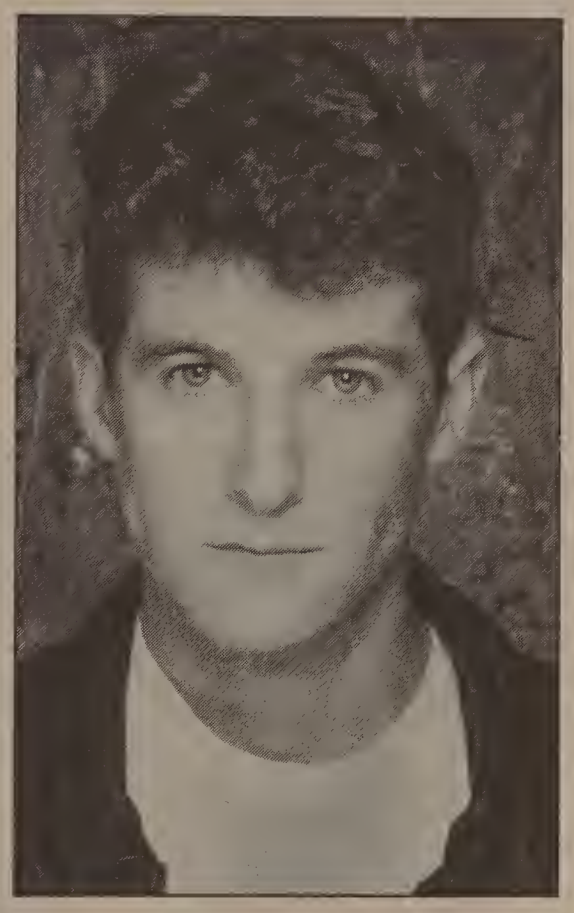
For as long as I've been out and the severity of it, in the back of my mind, before I started playing again, I think, 'this could be career-ending.' It takes its toll on you, mentally. But then, I really want to spend a little more time with this golf thing, because that could get my mind off hockey and what I was doing. Plus, I love this city. I plan on hanging around. ❑

STITCHES 10TH ANNIVERSARY

More Than Just a Brief History of Time

BY ROSS GARMIL

In the beginning, God created the heavens and the Earth. Then came some dinosaurs, the Ice Age, a whole bunch of kings, William Shakespeare, the American Revolution, prohibition, Albert Einstein, and, of course, the Bee Gees. And then, in 1983, a comedy club known as Stitches first opened its doors. Well, the Bee Gees may be gone (hopefully) but Stitches is still alive and well. And on April 1st, 2nd, and 3rd the club will be throwing an all-out bash to celebrate it's decade of being.



How does a comedy club commemorate such an event? Paper hats and dumb party favors? Nah. More likely are prank calls to Congressman Fred Garvey (R-Iowa) saying, "Hey, didn't you used to be Gopher on 'The Love Boat?'" But not in this case.

Instead Stitches decided to ask some comedians help them celebrate their anniversary. Forty comedians, to be precise. In three days. This equals ten comedians per show (with two shows on Saturday night). Now consider this: a normal comedy show features one emcee, one opening act and one comic headliner. That adds up to three comedians in an average show (just in case you weren't paying attention.)

Through some simple arithmetic it can be derived that these shows will be 3.33 times larger than your regular comedy cavalcade. While it is as of yet unclear what Stitches plans to do with the extra .33 of a comedian left over, one can easily ascertain that this anniversary fest will add up to include a whole lot o' laughs.

Stitches has worked hard over the past decade to firmly place itself on the large map of successful Boston comedy clubs. From hosting HBO's 10th Young Comedians Special, to presenting the annual "Comedy Riot" open-mike competition, the club has helped bring comedy to the city for years. And now, rather than rest on their laurels (or sit on their duffs, whatever the case may be), Stitches has decided to work long and hard to make their own tenth anniversary not only a special event for themselves, but also for the local comedy scene.

Like other premier Boston clubs, Stitches has featured national headliners such as Jerry Seinfeld and Steven Wright, but now they've shifted gears towards showcasing Boston talent, and their anniversary show is a perfect illustration. The first night will be hosted by local comedian Anthony Clark. Other comedians to be featured will include, on the 1st: D.J. Hazard, Don Gavin, Mike Donovan, Brian Kiley, Lizz Winstad, Bill Campbell, Teddy Bourgeron. The second will bring Tony V., Julie Barr, George MacDonald, Larry Sullivan, Marci Rose , with Mike Bent, Billy Martin and Chris Zito on the third.

Anthony Clarke hosts the first night of the 10th anniversary celebration on April 1st.

The show times for this gala will be at 8:30 p.m. on April 1st, 8:30 p.m. on April 2nd, and both 8:30 p.m. and 10:30 p.m. on April 3rd. If you can't get enough of stand-up comedy, then perhaps this show will help. ❑

FLICKS IN A FLASH

Groundhog Day

"Funny, time after time"

This is a classic Harold Ramis film, despite the odds against a film based on repetition being anything but annoying. Bill Murray gives a vintage performance as weatherman Phil Connors, a man stuck in time and in Punxsutawney, Pennsylvania. Andie MacDowell (under-used as Connors' new station producer) and Chris Elliott (as cameraman Larry) add to the comedic mix as Connors finds himself forced to deal with the same situations, people and television shows over, and over, and over again. T.S.L.

Lorenzo's Oil

"A Brave and Daring Brew"

Based on the lives of Augusto and Michaela Odone, Lorenzo's Oil is the story of a couple's efforts to save the life of their son from adrenoleukodystrophy (ALD). In this gritty, painful and brilliant picture, the parents (Nick Nolte and Susan Sarandon) not only push the medical establishment for answers, but take up ALD research on their own. While keeping their marriage and their son alive. Nolte's Italian accent is annoying for a while, but it is the only false note in an otherwise important film about the power of determination in the face of helplessness. B.C.

A Few Good Men

'Exciting, Moving, and Funny"

A Few Good Men has all the right ingredients: big stars, politically-relevant drama climaxing in a riveting courtroom scene, good dialogue, even a sprinkling of comedy. Two Marines are on trial for murdering one of their own. Lawyers Tom Cruise and Demi Moore try to prove the death was an accident caused by an order coming from above. Cruise plays his usual hot shot with élan. Moore gives a dignified performance as an internal affairs officer. Jack Nicholson is convincing as a hard-nosed colonel, even when he lapses into shtick.

Bad Lieutenant

'Lurid, Funny, Hard to Take"

Director and co-author Abel Ferrara's lurid tale of a New York City cop whose life is caught in an urgent downward spiral is hard to take but worth seeing for Harvey Keitel's remarkable performance as the bad lieutenant. How bad is he? Well, he's a junkie, a liar, a thief, a gambler, a sexual profligate – and a lapsed Catholic. But he's not evil, and he gets a shot at redemption. Costars include New York's mean streets; Zoe Lund, the movie's co-author, as an alarmingly zoned-out junkie; and the Mets and the Dodgers, on whose games the bad lieutenant plays "bet your life." The movie is funny in a Sid and Nancy kind of way. Watching a character shamelessly indulge his most infantile desires, even as he self-destructs, can be liberating.

Scent of A Woman

"Pacino Reeks of Hoffman"

A blind, grouchy, former military officer (Pacino) takes his new prep school "babysitter" (Chris O'Donnell) on a Thanksgiving weekend extravaganza in New York City. While the youth frets for Pacino's safety (and about his own problems at school), Pacino overtips waiters, dances the Tango and correctly identifies the perfume (not to mention the hair and eye color) of every woman he meets. B.C.

INDEPENDENT'S DAY

Gerald Peary Picks & Pans the Independents

BY GERALD PEARY

Olivier Olivier. Directed and written by Agnieszka Holland. At the Nickelodeon.

Agnieszka Holland's Europa Europa (1990) was an art-house movie for all, a thrilling, fabulist, magic, realist, true-life tall tale about a young Polish Jew who escaped the Nazi death camps - and abandoned his ill-fated family – when he swam into Russia and signed up with the Communists. Later, he eluded the Nazis again by literally becoming one. Passsing as a "Master Race" Aryan, he was adopted by German troops, and actually sent to an elite school for Hitler Youth. After the War, a Jew once more (happily), Solomon Perel emigrated to Israel.

For Olivier Olivier, Holland again constructs a movie from an odder-than-odd real-life story (she found it in a newspaper); and again, it's about a young boy horrifically separated from his family. This time, the setting is contemporary rural France. Little Olivier rides off for grandma's house on his bicycle and never returns. His family mother, dad, and sister – fall apart searching for him. Has he been murdered?

A few years later, a young man is found by the Paris police who might, or might not, be Olivier. If so, he has affected as many identity switches as the Europa Europa hero, Solomon. The petite, cherubic mama's boy has become a kinky Wild Child teenager, who gets by getting picked up at public toilets. So Olivier goes home, to his joyous mother and suspicious sister. If he's Olivier.

Not everyone is going to adore Olivier Olivier. Though there are no Nazis this time, nor heartbreaking scenes in the Warsaw Ghetto, Olivier Olivier is far darker in spirit than its Europa Europa predecessor. And weirder.

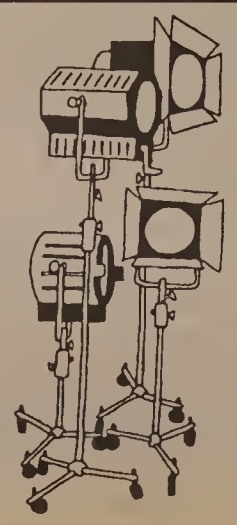
Young Sol, who was as ingenuous and ever-winning as Voltaire's Candide, has been supplanted as protagonist by Olivier: sly, morally ambiguous, perhaps as wicked as Cain. As for Olivier's family, they are neurotic, perverse, overly intense, and an incestuous cloud hovers over the dinner table. Mother covets son. Son shares a pillow with his sister. Father is out in the cold. In fact, Olivier's bourgeois family is perennially screwed-up, even before the disappearance.



But there are ample rewards for those viewers who settle in with Agnieszka Holland's fervent tale, which climaxes, quite wonderfully, in black magic and mystery, with even a shaky claim to happiness. Simply, Olivier Olivier is as haunting, and psychologically dense, as anything on screen this year.

Wax, Or the Discovery of Television Among the Bees. Directed and written by David Blair. At the Harvard Film Archive, April 2-12.

If Olivier Olivier treks into the unconscious on the cusp of Freud and Jung, Wax, Or the Discovery of Television Among the Bees catapults into its dream world via cyberpunk video imagery. Too much of it. "Five years in the making" of it. Director-writer David Blair has a bizarre story to tell, about a New Mexico beekeeper who, with a miniature TV implanted in his brain, partakes of out-of-body experiences, allowing him to see "the dead of the future." Maybe that sounds interesting, but Wax quickly becomes laborious, especially because Blair refuses to puncture his imagery-driven saga with humor. It's all too solemn.

Still, Blair is an ambitious video-to-film artist, and Wax does have its fans. The press kit comes with impressive blurbs. William Gibson, Neuromancer author, calls it "A winningly strange video narrative," while LSD's Timothy Leary praises Wax as "a treat for the eyeballs." ❑

Gerald Peary has been a film critic for Boston Review, the Real Paper, has authored six books on cinema and is currently teaching fim at B.U.

IMPROPER FLICK PICK

Not all Serbians are hawks on the terrible war. Srdjan Karanovic, a pacifistic Belgrade native, was among the most famous, honored Yugoslavian film directors when there was in Yugoslavia. He made eight acclaimed features and won the Critic's Prize at Cannes. For now, Karanovic is living in the United States and teaching filmmaking at Wesleyan University. He'll be at Boston University's School of Broadcast and Film, 640 Comm. Ave., on Friday, April 2 at 6 p.m., showing one of his best films, Hard to Swallow (a Huckleberry Finn meets John Cassavetes), and he'll talk also about the dire situation in his homeland. Admission is free.

POINT OF NO RETURN

Diminished Return

Maggie (Bridget Fonda) and her agency mentor, Bob (Gabriel Byrne), argue furiously after Maggie is forced to perform her first professional "hit" in "Point of No Return"

BY ANTHONY LEIBS

The current trend of Americanizing French films continues with Point of No Return, a remake of Luc Besson's 1991 hit, La Femme Nikita. This is, with very few exceptions, virtually the same film, but somehow is not nearly as good as the original. So what got lost in the translation?

The story is simple enough: Maggie (Bridget Fonda), a homicidal waif running with a very bad crowd, gets involved in a bloody shoot-out at point-blank range, and in short order is tried, convicted, and sentenced to death. In steps Bob (Gabriel Byrne), head of a super-secret government assassination bureau, who is impressed with Maggie's psychotic tendencies and utter lack of remorse over killing. He can use a girl like her. He fakes her death and her funeral, and trains her to be an assassin. Eventually, he allows her to live on her own, and even allows her to have a boyfriend (Dermot Mulroney). But she must come when summoned, anytime, anywhere, and kill on command. "There is no out," he tells her, and he means it.

It must have looked like a sure thing on paper: making an American film from a French film that had the look and feel of an American one, full of slick, American-style violence. It's the kind of film we do best, so what could possibly get lost in the translation? Even John Badham seemed a smart choice for director. He's a competent technician (Blue Thunder, War Games, Stakeout), and he's not the kind of guy who'd muddle it up with anything like an actual personality, or a strong directional point of view. But even though he stages the best scenes – the opening robbery of the drug store, the shoot-out in the hotel kitchen – with as much precision as a remake can have, something gets lost in the translation.

That something is a true sense of style. Even though La Femme Nikita was obviously influenced by American films, it had an exciting visual look of its own. Badham and Co., by carefully trying to imitate what was essentially an imitation in the first place, have produced an ordinary looking film. Neither film gives us substance, but Point of No Return doesn't even give us style.

There are other problems as well This version goes too soft and sentimental. We know that Bob, because he is so handsome, and because he always gazes at Maggie with soulful eyes full of sexual longing, will let her walk away. Also, there was a certain irony in Nikita: killing skills weren't enough. She couldn't become a proper femme until she looked and behaved like a lady. Here we're simply meant to notice how pretty Maggie looks once she reverts to her natural hair color and puts on a little lipstick. The effect of the transformation is diminished.

Uninspired and depressingly literal-minded as this remake is, the fault is not Bridget Fonda's. Although her performance lacks the feral intensity of Anne Parillaud's in Nikita (she was truly frightening in her early scenes), Fonda is nonetheless an engaging heroine, handling the translation from drug-addled punk to professional assassin with skill and credibility. The script may go soft on her, but she manages, as she has so often in the past, to rise above her mediocre material. ❑

THE CRYING GAME

★ "A World of Endless Mystery"

A British soldier (Forest Whitaker) is abducted and held hostage by the I.R.A. That fact that the British soldier is black is the first, and certainly not the last, time Director Neil Jordan confounds his audience. One of the captors, Fergus (Stephen Rea), is drawn to the hostage's sweet, gentle nature, which complements his own. Later in London, Fergus looks up the soldier's girlfriend (Jaye Davidson) and is drawn to her, too. He gets caught up in her nighttime world of romance, vague longings, torch songs and smoke filled barrooms. Although the world is mysterious and somewhat sinister, it's a refuge, at least for a short time, from the harsh daytime world and its so-called truth. The power of The Crying Game is the power of poetry or jazz: it's evocative and illusive. Jordan is less concerned with truth than he is with the endless mystery that's at the heart of truth – and art.

FALLING DOWN

★ "This Dark Comedy Stands Out"

Michael Douglas sporting a crew-cut, glasses, white button-down shirt and a pocket protector abandons his car in a Los Angeles traffic jam and sets out on foot for home. After exchanging his briefcase for weapons, the man known only by his license plate "D-FENS" explodes when confronted with the familiar stresses of urban life. Is he an average white guy who has been pushed to the edge? Or is he an over-the-edge, vigilante sociopath? The movie is sure to strike a chord with anyone who has ever had a bad day.

MAD DOG AND GLORY

★ "An Exhilarating Odd-Couple Story"

An exhilarating odd-couple story that takes a smart look at the complexity of male bonding. Wayne Dobie (Robert De Niro), a shy evidence technician for the Chicago police, saves the life of loan shark Frank Milo (Bill Murray), who thanks Dobie with a temporary gift of the beautiful Glory (Uma Thurman). The romance that blossoms between Dobie and Glory is one of the few predictable developments in Richard Price's otherwise clever script, which fortunately focuses more on the relationship between the men. De Niro is convincing as an ordinary guy who longs to be an artist. Murray stands out as the charming, sinister, and unhappy Milo who longs to be a stand-up comedian.

SOMMERSBY

★ "Get Out Your Handkerchief"

When Jack Sommersby (Richard Gere) returns home from the Civil War after being away for many years, his wife (Jodie Foster) is understandably wary: the old Jack was a drunk and wife-beater, this Jack is gentle and kind. The husband sets about wooing his wife, being a father to his boy, and restoring their Tennessee farm. Inevitably, his past comes back to haunt him. The movie works best as a love story. Less interesting is Jack's transformation into a community leader who champions a tobacco growing scheme that promises to make his neighbors – black and white – prosperous landowners. It means too few domestic scenes and too many shots of tobacco plants. You may want to bring a handkerchief or pick up extra napkins with your popcorn. The ending is a wet one.

An Interview With Mollie Sugden

Serving up the Laughs for 20 Years

BY JOHN HALL

"Mrs. Slocombe, are you free?"—"No, but I'm not very expensive!" replies Mollie Sugden, of the amazing Technicolor hair-do. Despite an impressive number of TV and theater performances, this actress remains best known as Mrs. Slocombe, head of Ladies' Intimate Apparel in the British sitcom Are You Being Served?

For the record, Mollie's real hair is blondish-gray, not blue, pink, lavender, lime-green, or any of the other garish hues she sports as Mrs. Slocombe. She also looks much younger than her 70 years without the wigs and harsh make-up.

"It was my idea to have different colored hair," she explains. "At the beginning, they did tint my own hair; it was supposed to wash out, but it didn't. And at the time, my children were eight or nine, and I was picking them up from school every day, and of course they didn't really appreciate Mom coming with multicolored hair!"

Still serving up her considerable charm: actress Mollie Sugden

The first season of the 1991 sequel show Are You Being Served? Again! sees a major change in Mrs. Slocombe's appearance: her hair went white. Mollie felt that since the show was set in the countryside, Mrs. Slocombe's hair should look natural for once. However, she changed her mind again, just in time for the second season, and donned a lavender wig. "Why hold a mirror up to reality when the whole thing is so unreal, anyway?" she asks. "I mean, [the hair's] an old joke, but why get rid of it if people enjoy it?"

And while Mrs. Slocombe "devotes her life to her pussy," Mollie herself has never owned a cat. "I quite like cats, but we've always been a dog family," she says. "But I'm here to tell you I've got a whole shelf-full of [cat figurines], cat brooches, and pictures of cats, so I'm really not catless." And as for her character's constant use of the "improper" word "pussy," Mollie asserts that Slocombe "must [always] be totally unaware, because she really doesn't know. She's very naive, you know, is Mrs. Slocombe – she has no idea at all. It's the others who are rude, not Mrs. Slocombe!"

Mollie had worked in several sitcoms with director David Croft when he offered her the role of Mrs. Slocombe in 1972. Since then, she has played the character through the show's 12-year run, in its stage and film versions, and in the reunion series Are You Being Served? Again! (known in England as Grace & Favour). Asked if she had a model for the severe sales clerk, Mollie maintains that "a lot of it's in the writing," but that she partially based Mrs. Slocombe on a "dreadful dragon" of a department store buyer.

Because filming for Are You Being Served? took only two months every year, Mollie was free to do other TV work, which she did in abundance. "The theater was my first love, and television's my last love," she declares. For her, the most gratifying part of being an actor is "making people laugh. It is most enjoyable." Her other credits include The Liver Birds, Coronation Street, and My Husband and I, which starred Mollie's real-life husband of 36 years, William Moore.

While awaiting word from the BBC on a third season of Are You Being Served? Again!, Mollie has starred in a revival of the Agatha Christie play "The Hollow" with her husband – "We did bumper business ... so they want to take it out again the summer..." – performed in a radio play and flown to PBS stations across America to promote Are You Being Served?, filling in for co-star John Inman (Mr. Humphries), who was hospitalized for bronchitis. During her spare time, she enjoys knitting and gardening ("I just leave it to the pots on the terrace," she admits).

Mollie still can't believe the enthusiasm for Are You Being Served? in the United States. "I thought it would be successful in England....but it never occurred to me it'd be so internationally [known] -- certainly not in America! Still, I'm amazed – and, I might add, delighted!" ❑

Guys and Dolls

If Only the Songs Matched the Scenery

Lewis J. Stadlen and Richard Muenz in a scene from the national tour of "Guys and Dolls"

BY NANCY LEONARD

The national touring company of "Guys and Dolls" came into Boston for a month-long sit-down at the Colonial Theatre, arriving directly from San Francisco, where it closed the prior weekend, slightly breathless and a bit late from its over-the-road trek. On opening night, with the scenery barely in place, technical problems delayed both acts. Other problems were apparent on the second night - not the least being an absent principal, which caused the proceedings, already minus some opening-night energy, to miss a beat for much of the time.

With its glorious Technicolor trappings, classic songs, and vibrant pace amidst ever-changing scenery, "Guys and Dolls" has some lovely attributes, to be sure. But it suffers from an astonishing and disappointing blankness that belies the buzz surrounding last season's triumphant Broadway revival.

This musical fable of Broadway - with a book by Jo Swerling and Abe Burrows based on Damon Runyon characters, and splendid music and lyrics by Frank Loesser - has remained a favorite since it first opened in New York in 1950. Its cartoon-like collection of pinstriped gamblers and their dolls, along with an army of prim missionaries, was devised purely for fun, in the great tradition of the American musical theater (including its kinship to the vaudevillian stage).

Side-by-side romances give the evening its thin spine. Miss Adelaide, the Hot Box cutie, still hopes to marry Nathan Detroit after a 14-year engagement, and lure him away from "the oldest established permanent floating crap game in New York." High-rolling Sky Masterson bets he can woo Sarah Brown away from her mission for dinner in Havana, and finds her falling into his arms. Just a few complications - a Dick Tracy-like detective dogging the gamblers, a last-minute prayer meeting - precede the prerequisite happy ending.

Director Jerry Zaks envisioned this revival as a valentine to a bygone era and accordingly, his production is large and colorful. Tony Walton's cut-out sets and deliciously varied scrims (though still not perfected in their travels) are a dreamy evocation of a 1940's New York that existed only in the movies. William Ivey Long's elaborate period costumes are wittily multi-colored. Paul Gallo's lighting heightens the Technicolor impact and cartoon-like irreverence. All these combine to make the visual imagery the best part of the evening.

Most of the intricately crafted songs have become classics: "A Bushel and a Peck," "Take Back Your Mink," "Adelaide's Lament," "If I Were a Bell," "Sit Down, You're Rockin' the Boat," "Luck Be A Lady," and of course, the title song. The musical numbers are nicely focused, and several are enhanced by Christopher Chadman's spirited Fosse-like choreography (most notably, "The Crapshooters' Dance," staged in a sewer hideaway). It's good to hear these gems in context, but surprisingly, only a handful have real zip.

Zaks keeps the proceedings moving swiftly along, but beyond the visuals and the tried-and-true score, there's little that's really endearing. A certain mechanical energy substitutes for genuine enthusiasm, and there's a distinct impersonality in all the gloss. The second act has far more appeal than the first, which is odd considering that the musical highlights are so well balanced. Mostly, this seems a case of star roles being inhabited by supporting players (who also may not yet be comfortable with the Colonial stage). Overall, good but less-than-scintillating performances make for an evening of very limited charm.

Lewis J. Stadlen provides a spot of fun as the Groucho-like Nathan Detroit, adroitly avoiding matrimony with the same slipperiness he uses to avoid the cops. There's a relaxed ease to his antics. Lorna Luft sings and moves with skill in Miss Adelaide's various comic numbers, and is funny squeaking and sniffling through her psychosomatic afflictions. But she softens the chorus-girl image so much that she loses some of the sparkle.

Richard Sky, blessed with a stunning baritone and authoritative height, is a tad shy on characterization and romantic attraction, though his front-and-center "Luck Be a Lady" is quite grand. Heather Lee, subbing for Patricia Ben Peterson, was just about adequate as Sarah. Her voice had some nice high sounds, but couldn't easily handle all the numbers. Her acting, touching in places, left many blanks, and her blond attractiveness did not easily convey missionary restraint. Kevin Ligon is impressive as Nicely-Nicely, Joy Franz is a bright spot as General Cartwright, as is Andy Umberger's cop in electric yellow. Al DeCristo, James Dybas, and Lyle Kanouse add comic dimension to the crooks.

Strong in its visual and musical elements, but rather blank underneath the gloss, this revival shows why people leave the theater humming the scenery. ❑

Lynn Redgrave will appear in "Shakespeare For My Father" on Sunday, March 21, at 3 p.m. at Symphony Hall. The engagement is sponsored by the Bank of Boston Celebrity Series. To charge tickets, call 482-6661.

On Monday, March 8, at 8 p.m., Alvin Epstein and Julie Harris will give a special benefit performance for the American Repertory Theatre of "Dear Liar," adapted by longtime ART collaborator Jerome Kiltv from the correspondence of George Bernard Shaw and Mrs. Patrick Campbell. General admission tickets are $35. Tickets for priority seating and a special post-performance reception are $75. For tickets call the ART box office: 547-8300.

If you're having trouble drumming up enthusiasm over the return of "A Chorus Line" to Boston for the umpteenth time, try taking a charitable view: consider that this two-week stop at the Shubert Theatre (February 23 - March 7) adds royalties to the coffers of the New York Shakespeare Festival, the innovative nonprofit institution where the work originated. If you've never seen this musical, keep in mind that this is billed as its final visit to Boston. In past stops, it's been exhilarating entertainment.

Two popular successes of the '92 Shakespeare & Company season are coming to the Boston Center for the Arts, 539 Tremont Street. Tom Kempinski's "Duet for One" will play March 9-April 4. Inspired by the life of cellist Jacqueline du Pre, it follows the struggle of a world-class musician after she loses the ability to play. "Berkeley Square," by John L. Balderston, based on an unfinished novel by Henry James, will play March 10-28. Written in the 1920's, made into a film, and performed on Broadway and the West End, this mixture of a ghost story, farce, and romance follows a modern American hero back into the 18th century. Mail orders can be directed to The Box Office, Shakespeare Company, P.O. Box 865, Lenox, MA 01240. For information, call them at (413) 637-1197. As of March 1, tickets can be ordered locally, by calling the box office at 426-ARTS.

"Three Guys Who Know Better," a musical evening that is part political satire and part Great American Songbook, plays at the Lyric Stage Sundays, at 7 p.m. on February 14, 28, March 7, 21, 28, April 4 and 11. Jack Bresnahan, Lang Desjardins, and Robert Leinbach play the three guys. For tickets, call 437-7172.

Meanwhile, the Lyric is presenting Ranjet Bolt's new translation of Pierre Corneille's "The Liar" as their main program. This romantic comedy about a young man whose compulsive lies complicate and endanger his love life runs through March 14.

A two-part musical variety show titled "Ben & Brad in Berlin toBerlin," featuring Boston cabaret veterans Benjamin Sears and Bradford Conner, will be at The Performance Place, 277 Broadway, Somerville, Wednesday through Saturday, February 24 - March 20. The evening begins with a music-accompanied monologue, "Kaiser Bill," by Richard Weiss. For information, call Theatre in Process, which is presenting the work, at 267-1053. For tickets, call 254-1125.

Marianne Plunkett, the performer Boston claims as its own since she spent so many years captivating audiences in this city before moving on to New York, was recently singled out for critical praise in a New York Times review of her performance in George Bernard Shaw's "Saint Joan," with the National Actors Theatre. Mel Gussow referred to her as the "one consistently salutary note" in the company's presentation of classics on Broadway over the past two years. She "has gone about her acting with a clear-eyed determination and a talent that shines no matter what the surrounding pallor," with her prior roles leading up to this "impassioned performance." Boston theatregoers know of what he speaks, since they had an opportunity to see her in the same role in the 1985-1986 season at the Huntington Theatre Company. It's one of the Huntington highlights. ❑

SORENTOS

The Neighborly Thing to Do

BY R.E. BRUNSON

Sorento's is a neighborhood restaurant with a variety of dining options. It is a place for pizza with friends, for take out after a tiring day's work, or for a late night rendezvous with someone special. The restaurant is located in a large storefront on Peterborough Street in the Fenway, and is furnished in a minimalistic style with red and yellow patterned walls and heavy black chairs with natural wood tables. A lone shelf decorates one of the walls and there is also a bar-style counter that faces the large open kitchen. However stark the surroundings seem, the atmosphere is brightened considerably by the pleasant staff and the bustling of activity as the restaurant fills with customers.

On the night of our visit, bread was promptly delivered by our waitress as we looked over the menu. The rolls, warm brown pillows lightly dusted with flour, were made on the premises. They were accompanied by butter, but our preference was to dunk the chewy bread into the rosemary and garlic olive oil that was stocked on the table. The menu was very straightforward, with most of the selections falling under the headings of pasta, pizza, or calzones. Wine and beer were unavailable, but should be served in the near future, since the restaurant has recently received the appropriate license.

For starters, the antipasto plate ($7.60) was a delightful surprise. The plate was filled with olives, chicken covered with fresh pesto, roasted peppers (with a hot zing), thinly-sliced prosciutto, roasted eggplant, and a wedge of tangy, nutty fontinella cheese. The only disappointment was the olives – they appeared to be the pitted, canned ones from California.

For main courses, an attempt was made to touch all bases by ordering a pizza called the Panino ($11), a calzone of chicken and prosciutto ($9.25) and two pasta dishes, rigatoni Milano ($10.15) and capellini con pollo ($9.25). While waiting for the food, our attention was drawn to the line of individuals waiting for take-out. The influx of customers was constant. Periodically, delivery people would make an entrance, grab a parcel, and run out the door. After seeing all this activity, we questioned our waitress and a take-out menu was produced. As we dreamed of the delivery possibilities, the pizza arrived.

The panino pizza, one of the more expensive pizzas on the menu, came with a crisp, thin crust and was covered with prosciutto, mushrooms, onions and fontinella cheese. It was delicious, and with eight large slices there was more than we could handle (the leftovers were taken home). Next, the prosciutto and chicken calzone arrived, its deep brown crust encasing the triple layers of sliced chicken breast, prosciutto and a mixture of mozzarella, romano and fontinella cheeses. The calzone was tasty and filling – Italian comfort food. Even those who initially found it a little plain thoroughly enjoyed the calzone with the addition of tomato sauce (side order $1.45).

However, the true favorite was the rigatoni Milano. The bowl of al dente rigatoni was mixed with a light cream sauce with mushroom and, inexplicably, vodka. This lively dish was passed around the table several times as it was tasted again and again. In contrast to the rigatoni, the capellini con pollo proved to be a disappointment. In this dish, sautéed medallions of ground chicken breast, pine nuts and prosciutto were served with mushrooms and artichoke hearts in a Dijon mustard cream sauce over capellini pasta. Unfortunately, the Dijon mustard so overpowered the other ingredients that it set our teeth on edge. The dish was left unfinished.

Sometimes, simple things are the best. This was certainly the case with the desserts; the homemade cannoli ($2) was the best dessert of the evening. The thin and crunchy shell was filled with a lightly sweetened ricotta and sprinkled with powdered sugar. Accompanied by the cappuccino ($2.50), it was a marriage made in heaven. The other desserts were pleasant, but not too inspiring. The apple cheesecake ($3.25) had a crumb topping and layer of apples between the cheesecake and the graham cracker crust. It was a little dry. The Pecan Pie ($2.50) bore a strong resemblance to its southern cousins and was quite good with the exception of the heavy crust. All in all, it was a pleasant evening with pleasing food. Every neighborhood should be so lucky. ❑

Kosher for Passover, Drinkable Anytime

BY JONATHON ALSOP

Let me confess that kosher wine is a once-a-year experience for me, and it's the same for many people. Some memories persist, but they're of misripened, sickly sweet Concord wines, and the injunction each year of the Manischewitz Doctrine refutes any progress a wine lover might hope to make.

Last year's pitiful Passover wine offerings (supplied by myself) were brutal, with strange fruit-gone-south flavors and aromas of rubber and soap. This year will not be a repeat performance, even if I have to buy a bunch of Adelsheim pinot noir and pinot gris from Oregon and bear the sin of passing it off as kosher based on its quasi-Jewish name. Not that I recommend this. You could do it, but it would be wrong.

Ian White and the wine pros at Marty's in Allston are hosting their annual free kosher fine wine tasting Saturday, April 3 from 2-4 p.m. The good news is the selection of good kosher wines. The strange news is that I find myself wanting a couple of these wines again, kosher or not. Which ones, you ask?

- '90 Baron Herzog Sauvignon Blanc (Cal.), $8: lean, sharp and dry, fresh cut grass, very good, very much like fume blanc. '
- '92 Carmel Sauvignon Blanc "Samson" (Israel), $6: a bargain, forceful and unique, big grapefruit and pineapple flavors, fun acidic zing, sunny. '
- '90 Yarden Galil Chardonnay (Israel), $12.50: lean and delicious, very civilized, nice cream and butter, a solid chardonnay.
- '90 Baron Herzog Reserve Chardonnay (Cal.), $13: a winner, classic California "reserve" style with big butter, big oak, toast and butterscotch.
- NV J. Furst California Red Table Wine (Cal.), $6.50: smells like tree sap, tastes like red licorice pop; OK for the money, winner of this year's "Easy-To-Drink" award.
- '90 Carmel Cabernet Sauvignon "Samson" (Israel), $6.50: very pleasing cinnamon and mincemeat, a little light on the fruit, a good cheap red.
- '88 Carmel Galil Cabernet Sauvignon (Israel), $10: full of smoke and oak, aromas of tobacco and dry herbs with flavors of over-ripe black fruit, very nice French styling.
- '89 Baron Herzog Cabernet Sauvignon Special Cuvee (Cal.), $10: straight-ahead California cab, bright fresh fruit, great spices, easy to love at $10.

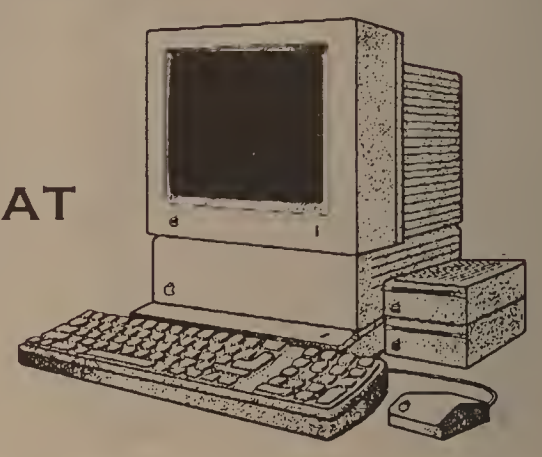
- Violette in Cambridge, either the first or last Sat. of each month.

Fine Wine On A Tight Budget

Beacon Beverage, Brookline:

- '85 Kendall-Jackson "DePatie-DuPratt Vineyard" Zinfandel $9, wonderful mature zin with good fruit and kinky spice.
- '83 Seville Estate "Lilydale" Cabernet Sauvignon 3/$12, in Aussie years, this '83 is more like '73, ancient eucalyptus, sweet pumpkin pie and dense fruit, delicious, drink now.
- '85 Ca' del Bosco Franciacorta $7, bargain blend with cabernet franc and merlot versus barbera and nebbiolo.

Gordon's, Waltham: till 4/17, 20% off all wines under $10, 12-bottle minimum assortment, it doesn't get any better than this.



- Mixed case, red: '89 Ch. Recougne, '90 Brusset CdR Cairanne, '90 Bel Arbors Zin, average $5.45 a bottle. Mixed case, white: '91 Ca' del Solo, '91 Jepson SB, '91 R.H. Phillips Chard, average $6.39 a bottle.

Bay State Food, corner of Beacon & Summit in Brookline: this little grocery has a hideous wine & booze hovel attached and has long held first place as World's Worst Wine Shop Ever (All Categories), but this week it managed to hack up two decent bargains. '90 Latour Pinot Noir $6 and '86 Hill-Smith Semillon Botrytis Affected $2.50/half-bottle. ❑

HOTHOUSE FLOWERS' 'SONGS FROM THE RAIN'

A Fertile Breeding Ground For Hits

The Hothouse Flowers

BY CHRISTOPHER FRANCESCANI

The Hothouse Flowers have an incredibly bright, large sound. They bring together the hard-won sincerity of a young Springsteen, the sprawling tenor of all the soul greats, and the potentiality in their playing that lends aliveness to rock and roll, and authenticate it with a sound that is as unique as it is eclectic. The real feel of their music brims over with the simple conviviality that draws off of authentic Irish music from the Waterboys and the Chieftains to Van Morrison and on through the annals of traditional Irish storytellers and musicians.

Absent from this country since a WBCN Homeless Benefit at the Boston Garden in October 1990, following the release of their second album, Home, the Hothouse Flowers have been anything but stagnant in the periods between their albums. Their latest release, Songs from the Rain, shows them to be blossoming into a major force in the contemporary pop scene.

Since Home, the band has appeared on recordings that span the pop music spectrum. Among them is Rolling Stone Ronnie Wood's recent Slide on This solo album. "We met [Wood] in Dublin," says Hothouse guitarist Fiachna O'Braonain. "He lives outside the city and he's a frequenter of some of the late-night establishments that we like to patronize. We just hit it off and exchanged phone numbers."

Another collaboration followed with Def Leppard singer Joe Eliot for some Leppard B-sides: "This Irish television program puts musicians together who might not necessarily collaborate otherwise," explains singer and keyboard player Liam O'Maonlai. "He's a really solid musician to work with."

American folk singer Michelle Shocked enlisted their help for her critically-acclaimed Arkansas Traveler set. "She was traveling around with a mobile studio, recording with a lot of people that she admired," says O'Braonain. "She asked us to help her out on one of the songs, 'Over The Waterfall,' so she came to Dublin and we just recorded there in a day. We've become great friends." They've jammed with The Waterboys and The Dubliners, and various band members have contributed to new albums by singers Andy White and Luka Bloom.

As schoolboys, Liam and Fiachna attended Scoil Lorcain in the south Dublin suburb of Monkstown, where all their subjects were taught in traditional Gaelic, and where they were first introduced to traditional Irish instruments like the bodhran drum, the dijerido, and Liam's signature tin whistle. The friendship wound its way through a brief college stint in 1985, and several bands, until the pair took to busking on the streets of Dublin as the Incomparable Benzini Brothers, actually winning a 1985 Street Entertainers of the Year competition.

Peter O'Toole – bassist, mandolin and bouzouki player and fellow Dubliner – soon joined the troupe, inviting classically-trained saxophonist Leo Barnes along. Maria Doyle of The Commitments was an early member of the group, but soon seceded to pilot her own project, the Black Velvet Band.

A series of crucial turning points brought them from the streets of Dublin to the tarmac of international attention. Following their Street Entertainer triumph, the Flowers were invited to perform on Ireland's "Late, Late Show," one of whose viewers turned out to be U2's Bono, who dubbed them "a masterpiece of a band," and backed up his opinion with an offer of help. The result was a single, "Love Don't Work This Way," released on U2's Mother Record label, which was an instant success throughout Europe. In 1986, Rolling Stone named them "the best unsigned band in the world," and within weeks the major labels, seemingly always the last ones to know, came knocking. Within a year, they were signed with London's Polygram Records and have been with them ever since.

Now, with Songs from the Rain, the Hothouse Flowers are three albums into the music game and farther along in their understanding of the realities of stardom than is common for a band in their position. The Flowers are as firmly rooted in the soil as they are poised in the sun. They always point to their homeland as both an inspiration and a reality check.

"Thank God for Dublin," says singer Liam O'Maonlai. "Thank God we've got a place like this to come to."

"The Dublin people are always the first to keep us on our toes," adds Fiachna, "The first to let us know if we get too full of ourselves....We had no illusions about conquering the world or any of that. You can get out all over the world and play crap and get away with it. That's fine if you're willing to live with that. But as people, we couldn't live with that."

"You won't get away with that in Ireland," explains saxophonist Leo Barnes. "No way. In London, they might encourage you to play up to all that. But over here? We wouldn't last five minutes." Makes you wonder how U2 slipped by the Irish propriety police, doesn't it?

To say that the Hothouse Flowers are a great new band out of Ireland is fine, but with the overwhelming amount of potential talent out there, it's so easy lose them in the crowd. Longevity and tenacity define real success in the music business. What makes the Flowers so promising in the long run is their ability to tap into the most universal aspects of the human experience, and transform them into pop music that really moves. In mining the most elemental tenets of life, they create a familiarity that only a cynic could resist.

"The best songs are the most personal ones," O'Maonlai explains. "When I write a song about love, sorrow, guilt or forgiveness, I'm likely to be writing about something that just about everyone can identify with. Because I assume that my feelings are like everyone else's and vice-versa. We can only be so different from each other." ❑

BOSTON BAROQUE

Playing in the Big Leagues

BY STEVEN D. BROWN

This has been quite a year for Martin Pearlman and Boston Baroque. A new contract with Telarc has proven fruitful; their highly-acclaimed recording of Handel's Messiah was not only a best-seller, but was also among this year's Grammy nominees for "Best Choral Performance." Furthermore, Pearlman was the only classical artist to perform at the Grammy awards ceremony, leading the "Hallelujah Chorus" from the Messiah.

As it turns out, a gospel arrangement of the "Hallelujah Chorus" was also on the program. The original plan was for it to follow Pearlman, who would lead the more familiar version. However, as the schedule of performers for the awards ceremony took shape, the producers found that the program was running much too long. Their solution was to shorten the time allotted to each artist.

Pearlman's reading of the "Hallelujah Chorus," which normally runs at about three and a half minutes, had to be cut to two minutes. "This was something of a problem for me, because Handel had written his notes some time ago," he explains. "I said that it can't be done and was beginning to think that we wouldn't be able to do it. Walter Miller, the producer of the program, said that it was the only way we could do it You have to understand that Walter is someone who knows classical music and has worked with people like Itzhak Perlman, when he was on the show, and [Walter] got him to cut [his performance] down. Our conversations were all friendly, but there were certain production values that had to be considered."

When asked how this dilemma was resolved, Pearlman continues, "I called Walter the next day and suggested that we play for two minutes and then stop and let the gospel choir finish it. There were two technical problems. They were a little slower than we were and they were a whole step lower. When I got to Los Angeles, someone had put in a modulation at the point where we were supposed to stop. But we didn't use it. I felt – just let it be different, be a different tempo, not try to merge them."

Pearlman's philosophy on working under such foreign conditions is straightforward and practical. "There is a certain kind of Puritanism that gets into our field that we have to be careful of. To me, a Puritan isn't necessarily somebody who has more integrity than others, it's somebody who has less humor. One can just say 'no' and stay home, away from events like the Grammy's," he adds. "But I think what is important is to keep a sense of perspective on what one's musical life is about. Being on

LENNY KRAVITZ
ARE YOU GONNA GO MY WAY
VIRGIN RECORDS

Everything goes in twenty-year cycles, so it should be no surprise that the 70's have come back around and sandbagged us with all its requisite nausea: disco, bellbottoms, etc. Lenny Kravitz knew this years ago; he's been flaunting his 60's and 70's influences prominently over his last two albums, and once again on his latest.

The problem is that the 70's are different this time around. Unlike modern phenoms (such as techno, virtual reality, etc.), people don't consider it to be a genuine cultural movement. They're into it for its campiness: the whole thing is very tongue-in-cheek. We're not just laughing with it, we're lauqhing at it; it's not a style that garners much respect. So while we get a kick out of the off-Broadway versions of "The Brady Bunch," we can't help but chuckle at the dopiness of it all. And this is Lenny's dilemma; as long as he wears his influence so prominently on his gold lamé, ruffled sleeve, he risks being seen as a novelty act. Good tunes are Lenny's only possible saving grace.

To his credit, he frequently succeeds, although less often on Are You Gonna Go My Way than on the previous Mama Said. The Zeppelin, Hendrix and Marley stylings are out in force, but Lenny can't seem to measure up. Then aqain, who can? But as long as he keeps trying to be Hendrix (or Page, or...), people will bust his chops. At least moder music has the liberty of claiming apples and oranges when compared unfavorably with the past. My advice: book a tour with the Black Crowes, Lenny. At least you'll be appreciated, and maybe you can trade corduroy suits with the Robinson brothers.

DUKE ELLINGTON: SUITE FROM "THE RIVER"
DETROIT SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
NEEMI JARVI, CONDUCTOR
CHANDOS

The ubiquitous Neemi Jarvi is among the most innovative and interesting conductors active today. Still's Afro-American Symphony, written over sixty years ago, is a finely crafted essay incorporating elements of blues and the spiritual. If you didn't know what it was, you would likely think that you were hearing a recently discovered piece by Gershwin. The Ellington, heard in an orchestration by Ron Collier (no information is provided on him), can be favorably compared to Darius Milhaud's excursion into jazz, La Creation du Monde. But the Duke didn't make excursions into jazz – he was jazz. As for the Detroit Symphony, they sound marvelous, delivering polished and fully committed performances of both works. And wen it comes to the uptempo movements of the Ellington, Detroit's brass section really cooks – and on the front burner. Both works should be better known. Hats off to Jarvi, Detroit and Chandos for giving us the opportunity to hear them.

AIMEE MANN

The white-haired first lady of Boston rock, having tasted stardom fronting 'Til Tuesday, has released a superb collection of 13 well-written, intelligent songs. Mann's voice, easily recognizable, is in peak form, as she sings with poise and strength. What she lacks in range she makes up for in style and lyrical depth. The album opens with a straight rock song "I Should've Known," instantly likable with a catchy hook and a surprisingly powerful guitar solo.

But Mann is at her best on the atmospheric "Jacob Marley's Chain," her voice haunting over sparse arrangements. The pop songs here – "Could Have Been Anyone" and "Stupid Thing" – have intelligent lyrics, an excellent back-up band and practically force the listener to sing along. In "Long Enough For You," a tribute to a older lover, Mann's voice is beautiful, layered over strings and an orchestral arrangements. "I should be riding on the float in the Hit Parade" sings Mann on the danceable "Put Me on Top" – and with this release, she soon will be.

THE TRAGICALLY HIP

Back home in Canada, The Tragically Hip have sold enough records to go platinum on one previous release, regularly sell out stadiums in only a few hours, and can hardly use the bathroom without being harassed by their legions of fans. As a result, you'd probably imagine that their first big label American release would just about explode in your hands, right?

Well, not really. On Fully Completely, the band attempts to overwhelm its new potential audience with an over-glorified production sound that fails to make up for a lack of truly inspired songwriting. After repeated listenings you'll probably find yourself enamored with only a couple of tunes. The opener,

"Courage," and a later track, "Lionized," are examples of the band's potential, since either would hold up well even on the sparest of recordings. However, more often than not what you get are fairly indistinguishable riffs that wear themselves out early. Even Gordon Downie's strong vocals can't save an album that is never as big as it sounds.

THOMAS HAMPSON, BARITONE AMERICAN DREAMER:
SONGS OF STEPHEN FOSTER

Thomas Hampson and company, heard in arrangements by Jay Ungar and Molly Mason (known for their scores to several Ken Burns historical documentaries), capture the spirit of days gone by in this Foster anthology. Casting aside his operatic voice, Hampson sings with a natural tone that is ideally suited to these songs. Poorly performing Foster's music does it a great injustice. As performed here, with an accent on its roots in Anglo-Irish folk music, it is positively infectious.

REGGAE SUNSPLASH LIVE
Various Artists

Few realize the diversity that exists in reggae. From the pulsating beats and boasting lyrics of dance-hall Dennis Brown to the soulful, politically-conscious Mystic Revealers, there is infinitely more to reggae than Marley's greatest hits. These artists and a dozen others are featured on this collection recorded live at a six day festival in Jamaica.

Many of the tracks showcase exciting acts – it's a great first album for the uninitiated reggae listener. Reggae-soul singer Beres Hammond delivers "She Loves Me Now" sounding like accented Marvin Gaye. His voice is as rich as any of the Motown stars, and the grooves behind him are twice as danceable.

Also impressive is Dennis Brown, known as the Emmanuel the Crown Prince of Reggae. He is a well-established star, and "Wolves and Leopards" shows why. And the Dre'ds, a duo of young children, put Kris Kross to shame. These artists, combined with thorough liner notes by reggae historian Roger Steffens and produced by Lee Jaffe, best known for producing Peter Tosh's Legalize It, makes this collection an excellent primer to today's reggae crowd.

VAN MORRISON
THE BEST OF VAN MORRISON VOLUME TWO
POLYDOR 1993

Among the sea of compilations and "best of's," available these days, only a few can really be deemed necessary. There are few musicians whose sprawling history of inspired work demands collection. Even smaller is the group of time-proven craftsmen whose music truly demands a second compilation, a "Best Of, Volume Two." Van Morrison sits worthily among the giants.

His recently released Best of Van Morrison Volume Two is a collection of previously-released, mostly late 80's tracks peppered with a couple of early covers of songs by John Lee Hooker and Bob Dylan. While "Don't Look Back" forces us to do just that, much of his later work, including "In The Garden," from No Guru, No Method, No Teacher, and "Hymns To the Silence," remind us that, as far as he's gone, nothing has been lost on this guy.

From the epic tragedy Astral Weeks to his more recent Hymns to the Silence, Van Morrison has consistently shown himself to be a powerfully effective singer. Whether he's careening through waves of gospel-driven harmony or reminding us of what Jackie Wilson said, Morrison's career is a testament to the treasures of a life spent searching and seeking.

the Grammys was a great deal of fun."

As a result of that appearance, Pearlman has been receiving invitations to bring Boston Baroque to a variety of new venues. Already planned is a performance of the Messiah at the North Shore Music Theater next season.

Boston Baroque will conclude their current season on Friday, May 7 at 8 p.m. in Jordan Hall. Scheduled to be performed are the "Magnificats" by J.S. Bach and C.P.E. Bach. "It's an interesting pairing," says Pearlman. "The son was still very much under the influence of his father at the time he wrote it. There are certain structural ideas shared by both works. But the J.S. Bach "Magnificat" is something of a culmination of the baroque, while the younger Bach's is more modern in that it is more melody-oriented, leaning more toward the classical style." ❑

ABOUT LAST NIGHT...

Where the Yuppies Roam

BY LAUREN DARE, AKA THE LAST CALL LADY

Another night, another bar – oh God, someone pass me the Alka Seltzer, puhleeze. My social life is starting to take a serious toll on my gray cells; my brain is writing checks my body can't cash, and I risked life and limb just to drag my sorry self to a bar during the fabulous "blizzard" of '93. Hey, it's a tough job, but I think I'm just the girl to do it.

But where to go and what to do? My eternal question doesn't involve the meaning of life, or the difference between good and evil: my favorite conundrum is "What bar do we go to tonight?" In response, this particular night, someone suggested the Sweetwater Cafe. The Sweetwater Cafe? I said to myself, "Self, isn't this just another flickering star in the great Club Constellation, located somewhere between the Milky Way and complete oblivion, undoubtedly crammed with 'young professionals' (gag) on the make and those who would like to make them? Do we need this?"

SWEETWATER CAFE
Boylston Place
Boston
357-7027

Of course, we went anyway. Who knew? It was actually kind of fun, in a Southwestern themey kind of way, and yes, it was full of young professionals, but professionals at what is anyone's guess. My guess is that they were denizens of a career requiring limited reasoning and conversational skills. I arrived at this conclusion following an encounter with two slightly inebriated young men, both of whom are perfect representations of the "Don'ts" you'll find in my forthcoming book "How to Pick up Women Without Looking Like You're Trying Really, Really, Really Hard." However, I won't make you wait for my book to come out. I'll share the gist of that fabulous conversation with you right now:

Unknown drunk: "Whazza ddjgdk?"
Me: (Looking away) Silence.
Him: (Pulling on my sleeve) "Hey, my friend thinksh you're really cute."
Me: (Looking away) Silence.

OK, break in action for just a moment. Picture this scenario: First of all, I'm five inches taller than both of these guys put together. Second, drooling is only sort of cute when babies do it; you can imagine how charmed I am when this adult male tries it on my shoe. Further advances into conversational brilliance were attempted, but fell woefully flat since they were all directed at my back.

Meanwhile, I was turned towards the bar, busy doing Mind Erasers and reading the little brass plaques that cover the bar counter. These plaques can be purchased by customers to commemorate evenings at the Sweetwater. Not wedding type of occasions. Truly important moments, like the time Sarah won her eighth consecutive Air Hockey game, or that night Bob managed to chug six upside-down Margaritas without the expectable backlash.

These tablets tend to display profound inventiveness and creativity – however, I didn't get one. Nor did I get any of the Sweetwater's famous ribs (their kitchen is open till 11 p.m.) because I wasn't sure what kind of nuclear reaction they would produce in my stomach when combined with the Mind Erasers.

I also didn't meet the man of my dreams, but I could tell there were quite a few people who had more successful evenings in that respect, including my two above-mentioned friends who, by the end of the night, had managed to impress two very perky looking girls who didn't seem put off by a little drool. It was basically happy endings for everyone I guess, as I went home alone to my Alka Seltzer, to have sweet dreams while sleeping off the Sweetwater. ❑

MARCH 31 - APRIL 13, 1993

GENERAL FORECAST (If you know your ascendant, read it too)
Holy Moley, holy week already! A shift in time, (DST begins on the 4th) and already Palm Sunday and Passover are upon us, followed by a lavish Venus-Jupiter opposition late Monday night. Where to shop? How to stop? Pray the full moon in judicious Libra (exact Tuesday at 2:43 p.m.) can avenge the wrongs we've committed since Mercury turned direct, France turned right, and Yeltsin's progressed sun hit his natal Uranus (upsetting the order again!) two short weeks ago. Did NASA note that scheduling a launch the day Mercury changed direction was asking for trouble and will the weird Mars-Neptune opposition hang like a cloud over the April 7th shuttle launch? Holy Thursday is replete with messages lauding the crusading spirit, but over the Easter weekend difficult sun squares to religious Neptune and revolutionary Uranus, plus militant Mars action, does not bode well for the Prince of Peace or his minions. Who's invading, who's defending and who's skies are friendly enough to fly? Unstable Uranian activity usually signals earthquakes, eruptions and bombs bursting in air. Must you leave home?

ARIES (MARCH 20-APRIL 19)
A romantic entanglement can turn into a tug-of-war. As your Mars ruler battles for truth, justice and the American way, you could invade someone else's kitchen and hassle someone else's mom. Don't add fuel to an old family feud. During these testy times, Aries must be wary: No cosmetic surgery while Venus is retrograde! Take care handling appliances, razors, knives or an old flame with an active imagination and too much medication. As for your job, dramatic changes – for good, for ill – after Easter.

TAURUS (APRIL 20-MAY 20)
Friendship and your affiliation with a like-minded group fills in for an iffy romance. If you're political, your challenges can be particularly effective, but you may make promises no rational being could keep; if you're a gambler you'll take the long shots and blow a bundle. A hassle with a neighbor or sibling can turn into a fracas, there's a chip on everyone's shoulder. The safest course is to get lost on the golf course or fall down a rabbit hole until the holidays are history.

GEMINI (MAY 21-JUNE 20)
Play it again, Sam and get paid for it too. A recurring reward appears when your Mercury ruler favors Mars in your money house, which it did around St. Valentine's Day. What brave acts, what brilliant lines did you come up with then that deserve a reprise? Progress on the job, a clever career move and enough publicity to make your mother and mentor proud. Be very careful buying and selling on impulse, don't go off half-cocked, and stay away from guns and the guys who sling 'em.

CANCER (JUNE 21-JULY 22)
Artists and Crabs who work for women score big on April Fool's Day, but the reward soon becomes too expensive to maintain. Emotional highs and lows during the Libra full moon as you try to balance how you feel about working, where you live, basic creature comforts and a lofty long-range goal. As the Aries sun provokes aggressive Mars in your sign, aggravating an erratic relationship and whatever else hurts, you may feel you're the one being nailed to the cross. It's a tough two weeks, hang loose.

LEO (JULY 23-AUGUST 22)
Affection and nice-looking stuff from a woman of means or even a mean-spirited one. Another round of largess as the full moon plays havoc with your internal system of checks and balances. Pursuing happiness in the fast lane is how Leos respond to nuttiness, and right now everyone seems to be pressing panic buttons at work, the gym and the doctor's office. Be a pussycat and don't play around with drugs, religious fanatics or weapons while your sun ruler puts you at risk during the next twelve days.

VIRGO (AUGUST 23-SEPTEMBER 22)
And a child (a Virgin, no doubt) shall lead them. While the other signs are flipping out, stocking up or shooting off at the mouth, yours is the voice of concern and courage. Reason is yet not part of the dialogue, but friends, teammates and kids take your inspired advice to heart and your mate is soothed by your voice, your choice of music and poetry. While it doesn't sound like much, in this troublesome period yours can be the contribution that counts. The full moon highlights a money matter, think positive.

LIBRA (SEPTEMBER 23- OCTOBER 22)
Negotiating madly, badly? Anything to keep the peace. Full moon in Libra, plus another tense opposition between your Venus ruler and Jupiter in your sign pushes you to make promises, give up points and accommodate any schnook who asks for a favor. Meanwhile a partner, mate, parent, attorney or boss applies heavy pressure to stem your bleeding heart. People are angry, you try to placate them; caught between a rock and a hard place you do the only sensible thing – party down until the insanity stops.

SCORPIO (OCTOBER 23-NOVEMBER 21)
Neighborhood – down the block or on the other side of the ocean – means everything during these crazy two weeks. And that's not downplaying your romantic adventure or excellent physical performance. But what gets you going are thoughts about your proper place, geographically and politically, and the folks you feel spiritually aligned with. Planning a feast, celebrating traditions and hogging the court may be pleasant diversions, but the issues can't be ignored nor, unfortunately conclusively dealt with either. Remember, patience IS the key to heaven.

SAGITTARIUS (NOVEMBER 22- DECEMBER 21)
Expectations and enthusiasm are high, but once again the reality can't quite match the promise. Damn that optimistic Jupiter ruler! Making nice for the sake of the family, splurging on an Easter shopping spree may take up considerable time and thought. But the real challenge lies in resolving an insurance, tax or investment matter that's been lingering in limbo since early January when Mars last opposed the planets in your money house. Handle it before the 15th.

CAPRICORN (DECEMBER 22-JANUARY 20)
Hassles with your spouse, business partner or lawyer challenging your willingness to change a line or a lyric, questioning your faith in a higher power. (Is Clapton still God?) An attack by a sibling or parent is scheduled for Easter weekend but the first shots can come as early as the full moon. With all the oppositions facing you, it's a wonder you can maintain your equilibrium. After the Easter break the hostility abates, it flares up for a minute in June, and then it goes away for another two years.

AQUARIUS (JANUARY 21-FEBRUARY 18)
Work and service, health and safety – be careful in your habits. A reckless moment on the job, a chicken or an Easter egg that's been around too long can harm you, but your temper can kill you. While your erratic Uranus ruler is opposed by militant Mars and then squared by the brazen Aries sun, there's no telling how furious or dangerous you may become. Angry enough to insist on dramatic changes at work, expensive alterations at home. Try to diffuse this energy before it explodes, huh?

PISCES (FEBRUARY 19-MARCH 19)
Fantasies and fanaticism are both products of a thriving imagination, a Piscean asset that gets you through most situations, good and bad. But when Mars applies additional pressure to your Neptune ruler on the 7th, even the Fish can lose his way and succumb to unfounded fears and rumors. Remember that the closer we get to Easter, the more willing you are to become the sacrificial lamb, especially if a lonely kid or kindly lover is playing on your sympathies, leading you down the primrose path.

ALL POINTS BULLETIN
Lost: One brother. Description: tall, curly hair, devilishly handsome Irish boxer face. Responds to code name "Q". Last seen: Running to one job, running to another job, running to Newport, just plain running. If found, please return to the Editor. Milk carton campaign to follow. I can't do no mo.
Your sister (and her ass)

Margaret, Laura, & Lynn,
I win, you loose (i), and Philip is the prize. He's crazy about me, he has me five times a day (at least.) Such a pity that none of you can have a decent vaginal orgasm. You wouldn't even know what to do with a leather belt and handcuffs (I grew hair on his chest.) Good luck finding the pathetic fools you overweight bimbos deserve. Oh, and thanks for making me look so good. See you at B&D fetish night, NOT!
Cookie

Elders of the BSS,
Don't you dare judge us without the facts. Apathy may have killed DV and BSCF, but not us. A lack of funds did us in. We were poised for the best year EVER before the money didn't come through. If you think so poorly of us, hold your reunion somewhere else. But if you accept our hospitality, you have to accept us as we are—not as you wish us to be.
CB/SFC

L.R.
My we're touchy aren't we? Perhaps you need to realize that I write these messages jokingly. Look out Yog Sothoth is sneaking up behind you! Made you look!

Dear Rob,
Thanks for the disease. I'll be sure to share it with your brother—or did you get it from him? In case it needs to be said, go &^%&^ yourself twice and make it hurt.
With love,
Clytemnestra X.
P.S. There's a copy of this letter on your hard drive so you can read it whenever you want. Print out a bunch of copies. Paper a wall.

Yo, Raybo,
Your fear of condoms is irrational. Just think, if you had used them once in a while, the city's special ed. classes wouldn't be so overcrowded.
G.

To the woman in the Red Diamonte,
First of all, thanks for the horn & the look when I didn't move as soon as the light turned green. I just have one question. What pissed you off more—to get stuck behind that big ole truck while I kept going OR what it all those green lights I caught that you didn't? For your information I was downtown 5 minutes later while you were still at Kenmore.
Mr. Black Saab

Mark,
I know that you won't know this is about you, but I have to say it anyway. My girlfriend already works so much that it's affecting our sex life. If you ask here to do much more we won't have a sex life—we'll have a sex death. I'll pay you if you can keep her under 60 hours. That's all I work and I'm happy.
D.'s Boyfriend

L.
How many Fresca points do I have? If I cash them all in at once will I survive?
You know who

D.
All I ask is a big bed, a hot shower, a straight highway, a shopping cart, a well varnished floor, no roommates, and enough time, money, and food to take advantage of all of them (and you.)
M.

Mike,
Its not just the Girl Scout cookies. Its not just the delivery trips. Its not just the meter feeding. I think you're swell because you have the chutzpah to wear a banker shirt and suspenders with old running shoes. Ooh lala!
XOXO

Bonehead,
You left without seeing us again! Thanks a lot. Just don't expect us to send you any more hay for your best friend.

Dennis B.
You didn't show up for this afternoons rehearsal again! Don't you have enough energy to make it in? Come to think of it you do look a bit anemic. Perhaps you should be taking blood supplements.
The Director

F.
You are the sorriest excuse for a man I have ever had the distinct displeasure to lay eyes on. I hope you die a slow, painful death in a pirhana infested swamp. Maybe when you grow up you'll find another woman as good for you as I was. But don't hold your breath. On second thought, hold your breath. For a really long time.
XOXO
You Know Who

Dr. M.
Next time you want to put down a fellow employer by saying he walks like a monkey, just remember, it takes one to know one. Your Polo pants look ugly, too, so get a clue.
The new guy

Butthead,
Thanks for the card...and the new office nickname. I made the mistake of putting your hysterical card on my desk, and, due to the snoop-y nature of my coworkers, it immediately became the office yuk that you call me by my pet name.Thanks
Buttlick

Amy Jo,
Paula and Chris were great, so was Maine! Who would have thought? Thanks for making my teeth numb!
Love,
S. Michael

Listen up, Jerky,
You're BORING me. Why, why, whhhyyy are you so boring? Is it the cloggahs making you crazy? Is it Richard Gere? Is it the earthquqquakes? Is it the (cough, cough) smog??? Or is it just that you miss us to death? It sure is the problem here. Laughs are now at a premium. We miss you, Bonehead. Even the poodie does.
Us

Dietrich,
Stop following us. You've done enough to make us suffer already. Leave us alone or I will drive a length of oak through your cold heart.
Robert C. and Julie M.

Hey Weirdos
Let's make Uncle C. paranoid. Don't show him this newspaper!

Lady Olivia
I was almost willing to give you the benefit of the doubt when you told me you weren't in league with Edward S. But now I hear that you attended Belinda's little gathering. Don't expect any favors from me.
Lucina

L.G.
I appreciate the business you brought to me but please stay away from my store. For the last time I haven't seen your husband.
M. Tracy

Carol
Please stop playing with my mind! I like to be happy. I gave you back your pet, so leave me alone.
Larry L.

Non-Con-Goers
I haven't seen a bunch of stranger people for far too long. Thanks for the memories. I had a great time. See you next year.
Double

Oliver
Hey what say we head downtown and crash some stuffy parties? Those bastards have it coming to them.
Akawa

J-your turn. Dinner, drinks, etc. Get on it, or I won't be the luckiest girl in the WHOLE WORLD anymore. -xxoo, A

Papa C.
Don't think I'm not grateful for all you've done for me, but I really do need to get going. There isn't a half decent manicurist, hairdresser or plastic surgeon around anywhere. By the way could you give me the recipe for that delicious seafood stew? - C.P.

A Keen Interest In Keeping That Edge

Here's a service that satisfies (among other reasons) by the fact that it has an old-fashioned sturdy-trades flavor. Dom Siraco is, in fact, a fifth-generation knife grinder whose forebear operated out of an old-fashioned push cart (the pedal-operated grinder will soon be on display in the shop). Dominic himself wears a long, black, rubbery apron as he works. Among the wheels in the back are his 30" aluminum oxide, water-cooled wheel and another one for fine work and touch up; both are always twirling away, making their high busy-body noise. Of course, many of his customers are professionals with blades as their stock in trade – hair dressers, dog groomers, professional gardeners, restaurant owners. But, speaking bluntly, all households could profit from a roundup of dully-chewing knives, scissors, those grass shears, chisels, hedge cutters including electric ones, pruning shears, hair scissors, pinking shears (which are infuriatingly clunky when dull), little sewing scissors, that green paper cutter leading to a brief stay (Monday to Wednesday) at Siraco Sharpening Service.

If you have a push lawnmower, you can remove the blade and have that done, too. Sure, you may do some home sharpening, but the sharpening Dom can do, and the microscopically curled edge he can produce, is much better; some of what people do themselves, with their aggressive electric sharpeners, actually has the opposite of the desired effect. In the engaged tradesman tradition, he'll show you how the whole knife should look, once sharpened. There are also Russell Harrington knives for sale: boning knifes, French Chef steak or carving knives, bread knives and cleavers.

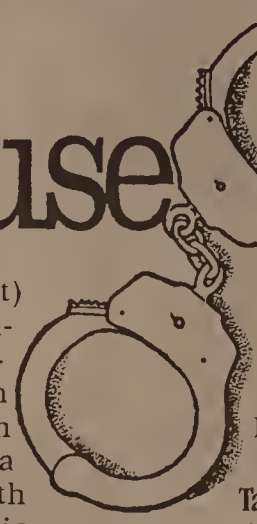
The Literary Back Fence



Since making a name, and an age, for herself with her book, An Eighteen Year Old Looks Back in the Seventies, Joyce Maynard has always shadowed her own development in print. She has gracefully chronicled her early marriage, the birth of one, two, and three children, their productive, usually cozy-sounding family life, and – of late – the demise of her marriage and the aftermath, which is vividly aftermathing forth. Having had a syndicated column and a book, she has now curled into the accessible form of a monthly newsletter, printed on sadder-but-wiser mauve paper. Now she's on an even closer walk with her readers – confiding, chatting, wondering, asking for their responses and musings on such things as God and body image. Joyce tracks the ways she has been too protective, at times, of her children, her shift into changing that, and the ways she has moved into the territory of post-divorce dating, complete with a matchmaker and a Personal's Ad. There's a charming piece by her son (a 10 year old looks back?). She worries the beads of what went wrong in her marriage – several times revisiting the episode of the extravagant Oriental rug that she bought on a lark (and a windfall check), which her husband repudiated and sent back as too impractical and too expensive. This object-gone-bitter metaphor becomes a discussion point for reader's letters. Because she is both famous and homey-familiar there's something hypnotic about having Joyce Maynard, with "shared experience good and bad," confide in you.

Even Blue Jeans Get The Blues

Jail House Jeans

Down underneath the House Of Blues, in a building painted a tell-tale shade of hickory-smoked blue, is the shop branch of the enterprise, Take It Easy Baby, where you can get duded up to hear, or perhaps sing, the blues. There is a sweet nostalgia to it all, with the ghost of Belushi hovering on ashtrays, T-shirts and in the air. The rough and the pragmatic, such as used 501 Levi Jeans, rather clean and tidy, and Carhartt workmen's clothes built to take the punishment of construction sites, and Black Diamond rainwear are interspersed with the floaty clothes of a hippie yesteryear. They sell those tightly wrinkled long flowered dresses, which recall the fragility of the early Mia Farrow and girlfriends called "my old lady," and even some tie-dyed things that take you back, while clunky black Doc Martens march you forward. Motorcycle culture is lovingly catered to in deer-skin leather jackets (one has a gorgeous Indian head stretched across it) and, speaking of babies, an unbearably sweet yellow leather jacket for some blues-bambino-in-training of about six. A little leopard-skin lycra in catsuit form, some ties painted dreamily with such icons as Lucille Ball and Elvis, a shirt with a skull and bones pattern, and a man's jacket with lapels crammed with buttons trailing the antic styles of various eras. A few CD's and a monitor that tells you what's up, musically, at the House Of Blues, reminds you that this is a sort of green room, though blue, for the performances upstairs. The motto is the same: Help Ever, Hurt Never.

Ah, the high fashion of New York, Paris, Milan, Boston. One of these seem not like the other? Be not fooled. Look and read, and learn why buying local might be the most fashionable move you've made.

Another year, another spring, another Boston Marathon...but wait. For those of us who are too tired, too busy, or (let's be honest) too lazy for to take on the real McCoy, there is an alternative. Regular people, do you have what it takes for the ultimate challenge? Yes? Then let us introduce the all-new Improper "Boston Barathon."

As if their name alone wasn't incentive enough to make you want to see this comedy troupe, know that HMFT offers the viewer songs, sketches and general mayhem. If you're in the mood for group hysteria, on a very palatable scale, read the column, then make the trip.

Improperly Yours

Mim Michelove

In theory, it seems so glamorous. A fashion photo shoot: beautiful models, beautiful clothing, photographer's high-tech trade tools all around. Hair people, makeup people, clothing people, even accessory people hover about discussing fabric, skin clarity, lighting. It's the business of images, and how everything looks in the final analysis.

But, as anyone who's ever been involved in any "fashionable" industry knows, what you see in the final photographs ain't what really happened on the shoot. You don't get to see the real, truly non-glamorous side to the shot, like the way everyone on the gravel roof had to wear sneakers or go barefoot, so the rooftop didn't get damaged. Or the way the 6 a.m. April wind whipped so hard and cold off the Atlantic that the models huddled together for warmth between takes, and the camera equipment blew helter skelter. You don't get to see the ugly steam pipes in the background, or the backs of the clothing, pinned tight to appear fitted.

What you do see, however, is the point of it all: beautiful models in beautiful clothing, posing without a care in the world. Daring you to look as good; tempting you to think you could. Showing you that, despite their own adversity, a little fashion goes a long way to making everything feel a little more glamorous.

Improperly yours,

Susanne E. Schantz

AROUND TOWN

To many people Patriot's Day is mostly the day when those foolish athletes run the Boston Marathon. But there's a reason that this day was set aside, and the good folks over at the Paul Revere House are ready to tell us about it. From April 18 to April 21, they will be hosting a series of events designed to educate the rest of us on the true meaning of Patriot's Day Prices range from $2-$3 with discounts for senior citizens, students, and children. The fun starts off when "Paul Revere" visits Boston on the afternoon of Sunday, April 18. Portrayed by actor David Bossio, Revere answers all those probing questions about his ride and life. The next afternoon will be a reenactment of the Continental Line march onto the grounds of Paul Revere's House. And, from the 19 to the 21, children will be invited to don hats and characters, and perform in their own recreation of Paul Revere's Midnight Ride (although this ride takes place at 10 a.m.). These events, however, are limited to 20 people and reservations are required. For reservations and details call 523-2338.

The Mark Curry express is rolling into town. Blazing out of Rising Star Central at breakneck speed, this 6 foot, 6 inch locomotive of a comedian will be making stops at the Comedy Connection in both Boston and Springfield on April 16-18. If you haven't heard of Curry yet, perhaps you should check your pulse. With his own top 20 sitcom, "Hangin' with Mr. Cooper", his own half-hour HBO special, and already having hosted the popular "Showtime at the Apollo," Curry is one of the hottest stand-up comedians in the business. Regardless of whether or not you've heard of Mark, go see him. The only regret you may have is the stitches he'll leave in your side. For information, call 248-9700.

Okay, everyone who loves to shop, raise your hand. Keep it up...higher...all right, you can put it down now. Sure you love shopping; who doesn't? And what better place to shop than Newbury Street, Boston's own Shopping Paradise? On Tuesday, April 27, the Newbury Street League will hold their 11th Annual Auction at the Ritz-Carlton Hotel, including a silent auction, a live auction run by professional auctioneers from Skinner, Inc., and a raffle. Every shop on the street has been encouraged to donate at least $250 to the auction, meaning all of the merchandise you go to the street for will be in one place, awaiting your bid. Proceeds from the auction will go to help sponsor the other programs run by the Newbury Street League, such as fund raisers for area homeless shelters and a semi-annual outdoor art exhibit. A light supper will be served, and guests will be invited to take the Old Town Trolley over to Charley's Eating and Drinking Saloon for a buffet later that evening. For further information, call 267-7961.

The world's smartest elephant, Tunga the Mongolian Contortionist, and a clown named "Mr. Fish" – Fellini soap opera or Seinfeld season finale? Neither; these and other exotic circus acts may be viewed beneath one roof as part of the Children's Museum's presentation of The Big Apple Circus. This year's production, "Goin' Places," is running through May. The 2,000 seat, fully-heated big top will be located at the Fan Pier (New Location) on North Avenue in Boston. Tickets are on sale now at all Ticketmaster outlets, the Children's Museum lobby and Bostix at Faneuil Hall. Phone charged tickets can be obtained by calling Ticketmaster at 931-2000. Ticket prices range from $10-$28. Every seat is less than 50 feet from the ring.

After the Battle of Marathon in ancient Greece, one lone soldier was sent to Athens to bring word of the Persian defeat. The poor soldier ran 26 miles from Marathon, uttered one single word – "Victory" – and died of exhaustion. Today's marathon, fortunately, is somewhat less gruelling. The 4th Annual Dana-Farber Marathon Challenge, is a true celebration of life's acheivement. Runners not only completing the Marathon, but also gathering $1,000 worth of pledges in the process. Sounds rough, huh? Well, it is rough; after all, it's a marathon. However, this doesn't mean discomfort forever. With that in mind, Dana-Farber supplies their runners with a number of fringe benefits, including a T-shirt, group training runs, a pre-marathon dinner and breakfast, a post-marathon banquet and awards ceremony, and a post-marathon massage. Plus, runners will be paired with pediatric patients for the Jimmy Fund clinic in the Patient Partner Program. They clothe you, train you, feed you, and massage you – now that's the way to run a marathon. For information, call 632-3020.

Boston Designer Denise Hajjar Provides the Inside Skinny on Boston Fashion

by Mary Lawlor

Denise Hajjar launched her own business, with all the hope and enthusiasm possible, at age 24. By 30, she felt like a failure. When she started, she had dreams of becoming a famous fashion designer, of having a showroom on New York's Seventh Avenue and selling her designs nationally. She dreamed of seeing fashions – her very own – featured in top magazines. At age 30, none of this had happened.

It took her family, Hajjar says, her friends, even her Syrian grandmother to point out what she had in fact achieved. She had her own business and had done it all on her own. Today, five years later, Hajjar has a spacious salon on Boston's Commercial Street, and a business that has doubled last year's volume.

What Hajjar also has at this point is perspective, and pride. She feels her fashions are just as good as the New York designers.' She says she's not Donna Karan. And she's not Calvin Klein. She's Denise Hajjar.

Sure, she still wants to sell nationally and see her creations on the pages of the fashion magazines. But she wants to do it from the Hub. And Boston, it seems, wants to claim her as one of their own.

the Interview

How do you start a new spring collection and season?

I start by thinking of my clients first – what they've been wearing and what they want – and still be fashion current. We're both going forward at the same time. We work together. They want change and I want change. I pick something very new each season. I'm selling to the fashionable working woman.

I can't be like Christian Lacroix. He's in a different league. For example, I didn't do bell-bottoms. Pay clients won't buy them, not one of them! Or the see-through fashions; my clients won't wear those either. These women want clothes they can wear from day to evening. I'm not in a position to make a statement. I'm in the business of selling clothes.

Tracy Aiguier

Isn't that a Karate Kid move? Ford's David Chokes (suit and jacket, Ches Couturiers) lives on the edge.

Has it been hard to stay in business and weather these economic times?
My business doubled last year because the same women – with good jobs – said "I need clothes and I don't have extra money to throw away." They know I'm going to give them what they want. I listen to my clients. I don't take them for granted. We respect one another. I don't intimidate them. They always come back. When they call me on the phone, I always answer their questions. They may call around but they come back.

The business has also grown due to the many women who have seen my fashion shows, plus word of mouth. I belong to many organizations which means meeting still more women. It's networking.

Have you been able to hold your prices?
This season is the first time in three seasons I went up ten to 15 percent due to the cost of fabric and labor, but it hasn't been a problem. I still feel I'm affordable. For instance, a woman can buy a good pair of pants in the stores for $250. My custom pants are $190.

For whom do you design? Is it mostly women who can afford expensive clothes?
My clients are 33 to 65. They're highly professional women – attorneys, doctors, interior designers, advertising executives. And women on their way up who have seen my things and want one good outfit. They come back each season.

What are the prices at your salon?
In the daytime grouping, the custom suits range from $450 to $550; dresses $200 to $300; blouses $135 to $250; jackets $225 to $325; pants $175 to $190; and skirts $140 to $180. My evening wear is priced at $300 to $600. The entire collection is done in a variety of fabrics. Everything can be interchanged to the liking of the clients.

You're now president of the three-year-old Boston Designer's Collaborative. Tell us about how the BDC helps young designers.
It began when a designer called me and asked me to get together with other local designers to start something that would promote fashion awareness. The first two years we did fashion shows and took press beatings because we weren't professional enough. We learned to take ourselves seriously last year. I wrote a mission statement with goals and objectives. I presented an agenda – all of that.

Our aim is to promote the talents of Boston's fashion community. It's a trade organization with a goal to promote Boston's fashion designs to an international level. We want to involve the area's best designers, retailers, publicists, marketers, financiers, so that we'll have a new mega-industry for the region.

We want to establish the city as a true alternative design center from New York, Paris, Milan, and Tokyo. If we're successful, it's estimated that Boston's fashion industry could eventually bring in well over $1 billion a year to the state from global markets in retail, manufacturing, licensing, and tourism revenues.

We hope to involve corporate sponsorship and support from leading area department stores, fabric suppliers, garment manufacturers, media, travel and hotels, banks, universities, and government offices of economic development. It's working. Our recent fashion show was a huge success. We have almost 40 designers and another 30 who are professional membership from the fashion industry.

Are there many menswear designers in BDC?
Yes, there's Marienbad (Patrick and Stanley) who make incredible sweaters, worn by lots of celebrities. And there's Ches who makes great suits and coats. I'd like to see more menswear designers start a business and be based in Boston.

The American designers are obsessed with costume craziness for fall. They're doing the Edwardian look, the Victorian look, those long, black witches dresses that look like they should have brooms as accessories. Have designers gone too far?
It's wasted fabric to do those extreme looks. The designers are running out of ideas. They're reaching and it's not working. I don't think the masses will buy the extremes. But there will always be the fashion victims – maybe one or two percent. You'll find the bell-bottoms on sale at the end of the season. They're okay on the younger girls, such as my intern who is 23. It's new to them. This age never saw the bell-bottoms or platform shoes or the grunge look. It's not new to me. Why would I want to go back and do this?

Since you're a woman and have built the business on your own, do many young designers come to you for advice?
Yes, because there are so many more of them these days.

They're always surprised to see how hard it is. This is not taught in fashion school. They're amazed at how long it takes to build a business and the effort that goes into it. And it all began with a $3,000 gift from my family...Today, I have my company, D'Hajj Couture.

In fashion, how do Boston women compare against New York?
There is fashion in Boston. Women do dress and I've seen a change in the past five years – it's phenomenal. They're dressing much more fashionably. They realize that they can look beautiful and professional at the same time. In the past, no one took time to explain and show the options to women.

If a woman's not a size 8, and thinks she can't wear a straight skirt, I show her that she can. She gets excited when I explain what needs to be done in order to wear it. I help them with body shape. I'm a built-in colorist, I suggest accessories. I don't leave them hanging. I also keep a record of their wardrobes. I may say, "remember that navy blazer, you can wear this new navy, red and olive plaid skirt with it."

Many of the French and Italian designers consider the American designers to be marketing machines rather than innovators. Does this bother you?
I don't consider this negative. We're in business. I don't have the luxury of backers with millions of dollars. Matter of fact, in order for my business to reach another level, I'll need financial backing. This means I'd be able to purchase fabric in quantities and get my designs in national showrooms so buyers will see my line. I'm constantly saying "How can I make a creative garment marketable?" That's what I strive for. That's what it's all about.

How do you see fashion in the future – in the year 2000?
There's nothing new you can do. Once you've achieved a look, what changes are the fabrics, colors, proportions and detail treatment. These things consistently change. How you interpret is your look. I don't think we'll ever be wearing space suits.

THE BOSTON (and An "Improper" Version of

by Nicole Mills

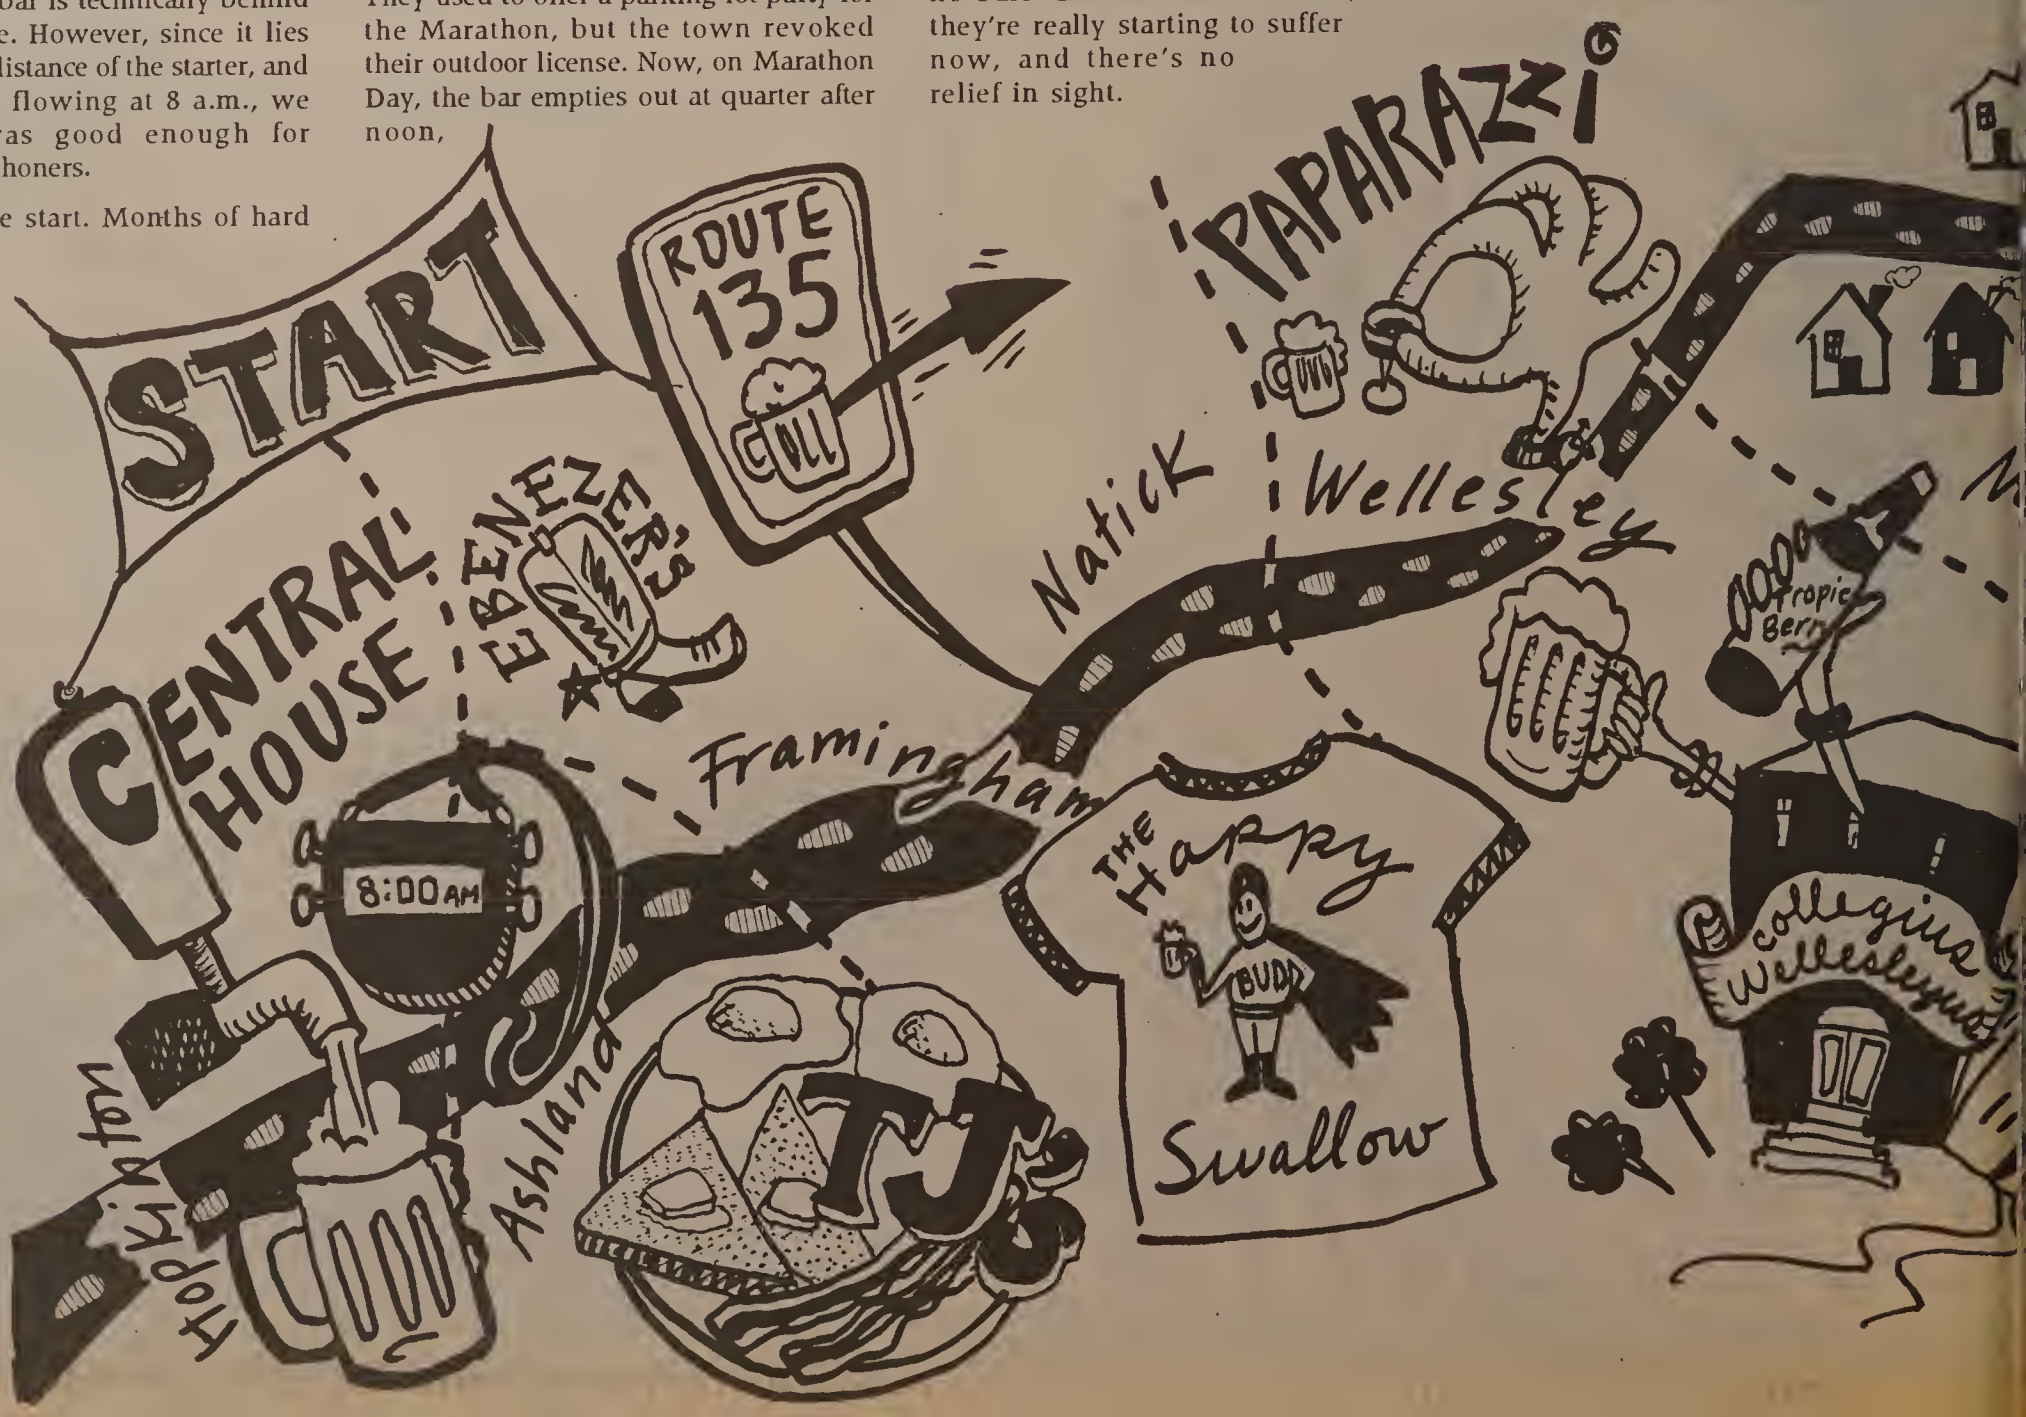
The Boston Marathon – the ultimate test of physical fitness and willpower. People train all year just to prepare for April 19, when this grueling, 26-mile event winds from Hopkinton to Boston's Back Bay. But there is an alternative to the shin splints, the weakened knees, the loss of control over bodily functions that are so common to these dedicated athletes. For those who have either faced the Marathon's grueling route and decided to hang up their Reeboks, or who have been armchair-contestants for years but yearn to compete with a dedicated field of contestants, The Improper Bostonian proudly presents its own Big Race – The Boston (and Beyond) Bar-athon.

For the few and the brave, the day starts at 8 a.m. sharp on Marathon Monday, at the Central House in Hopkinton. The starting line of the real Marathon moved to Hopkinton in 1926, and the Central House has been steadily celebrating this proud tradition. True, for the purist, this bar is technically behind the starting line. However, since it lies within spittin' distance of the starter, and the beer starts flowing at 8 a.m., we decided it was good enough for Improper Bar-athoners.

Finally, the start. Months of hard work have led up to this moment. The contestants are all pumped up, the crowd is elbow to bottle, we line up, the television cameras are rolling, the pistol cracks, and...We're off!

From the Central House to TJ's, located on the Hopkinton/Ashland line, is just a short sprint. TJ's is notorious for being the first bar actually on the Marathon route. Many runners have been known to get this far, and then hang up their numbers when tempted with a cold one. TJ's has an outdoor license, and on Marathon day, the parking lot overflows with people who are in good enough shape to do a few 12 oz. curl-ups, but not fit enough to go the whole distance. TJ's offers a "Pasta Feed" the night before the race for runners, and a breakfast buffet the day of the race for $3. When the first cut in our numbers reaches TJ's, the field starts shrinking; the dedicated contestants head back out onto Route 135, and point their noses towards...

Ebenezer's in Framingham. Ebenezer's is done up like an old-time saloon. They used to offer a parking lot party for the Marathon, but the town revoked their outdoor license. Now, on Marathon Day, the bar empties out at quarter after noon, when everyone heads outside to enthusiastically greet the runners. This lasts approximately long enough for the crowd to realize that they are standing outside drink-less, watching some masochists in running shoes. For Bar-athoners, it's still early in the course, and our contestants are still pretty fresh, with the exception of some slightly sweaty foreheads. Gleaming brows are wiped, and it's an easy half-block trot to...



The Happy Swallow, also in Framingham. A little hole in the wall, the Swallow features lots of Jack Daniels T-shirts, baseball hats, and authentic Budweiser memorabilia. The clientele is slightly less enthusiastic about the Marathon, but still more than willing to pour the contestants some race-sustaining cocktails; at this point, Bar-athoners need all the liquids they can get, because it's kind of a haul to the next bar.

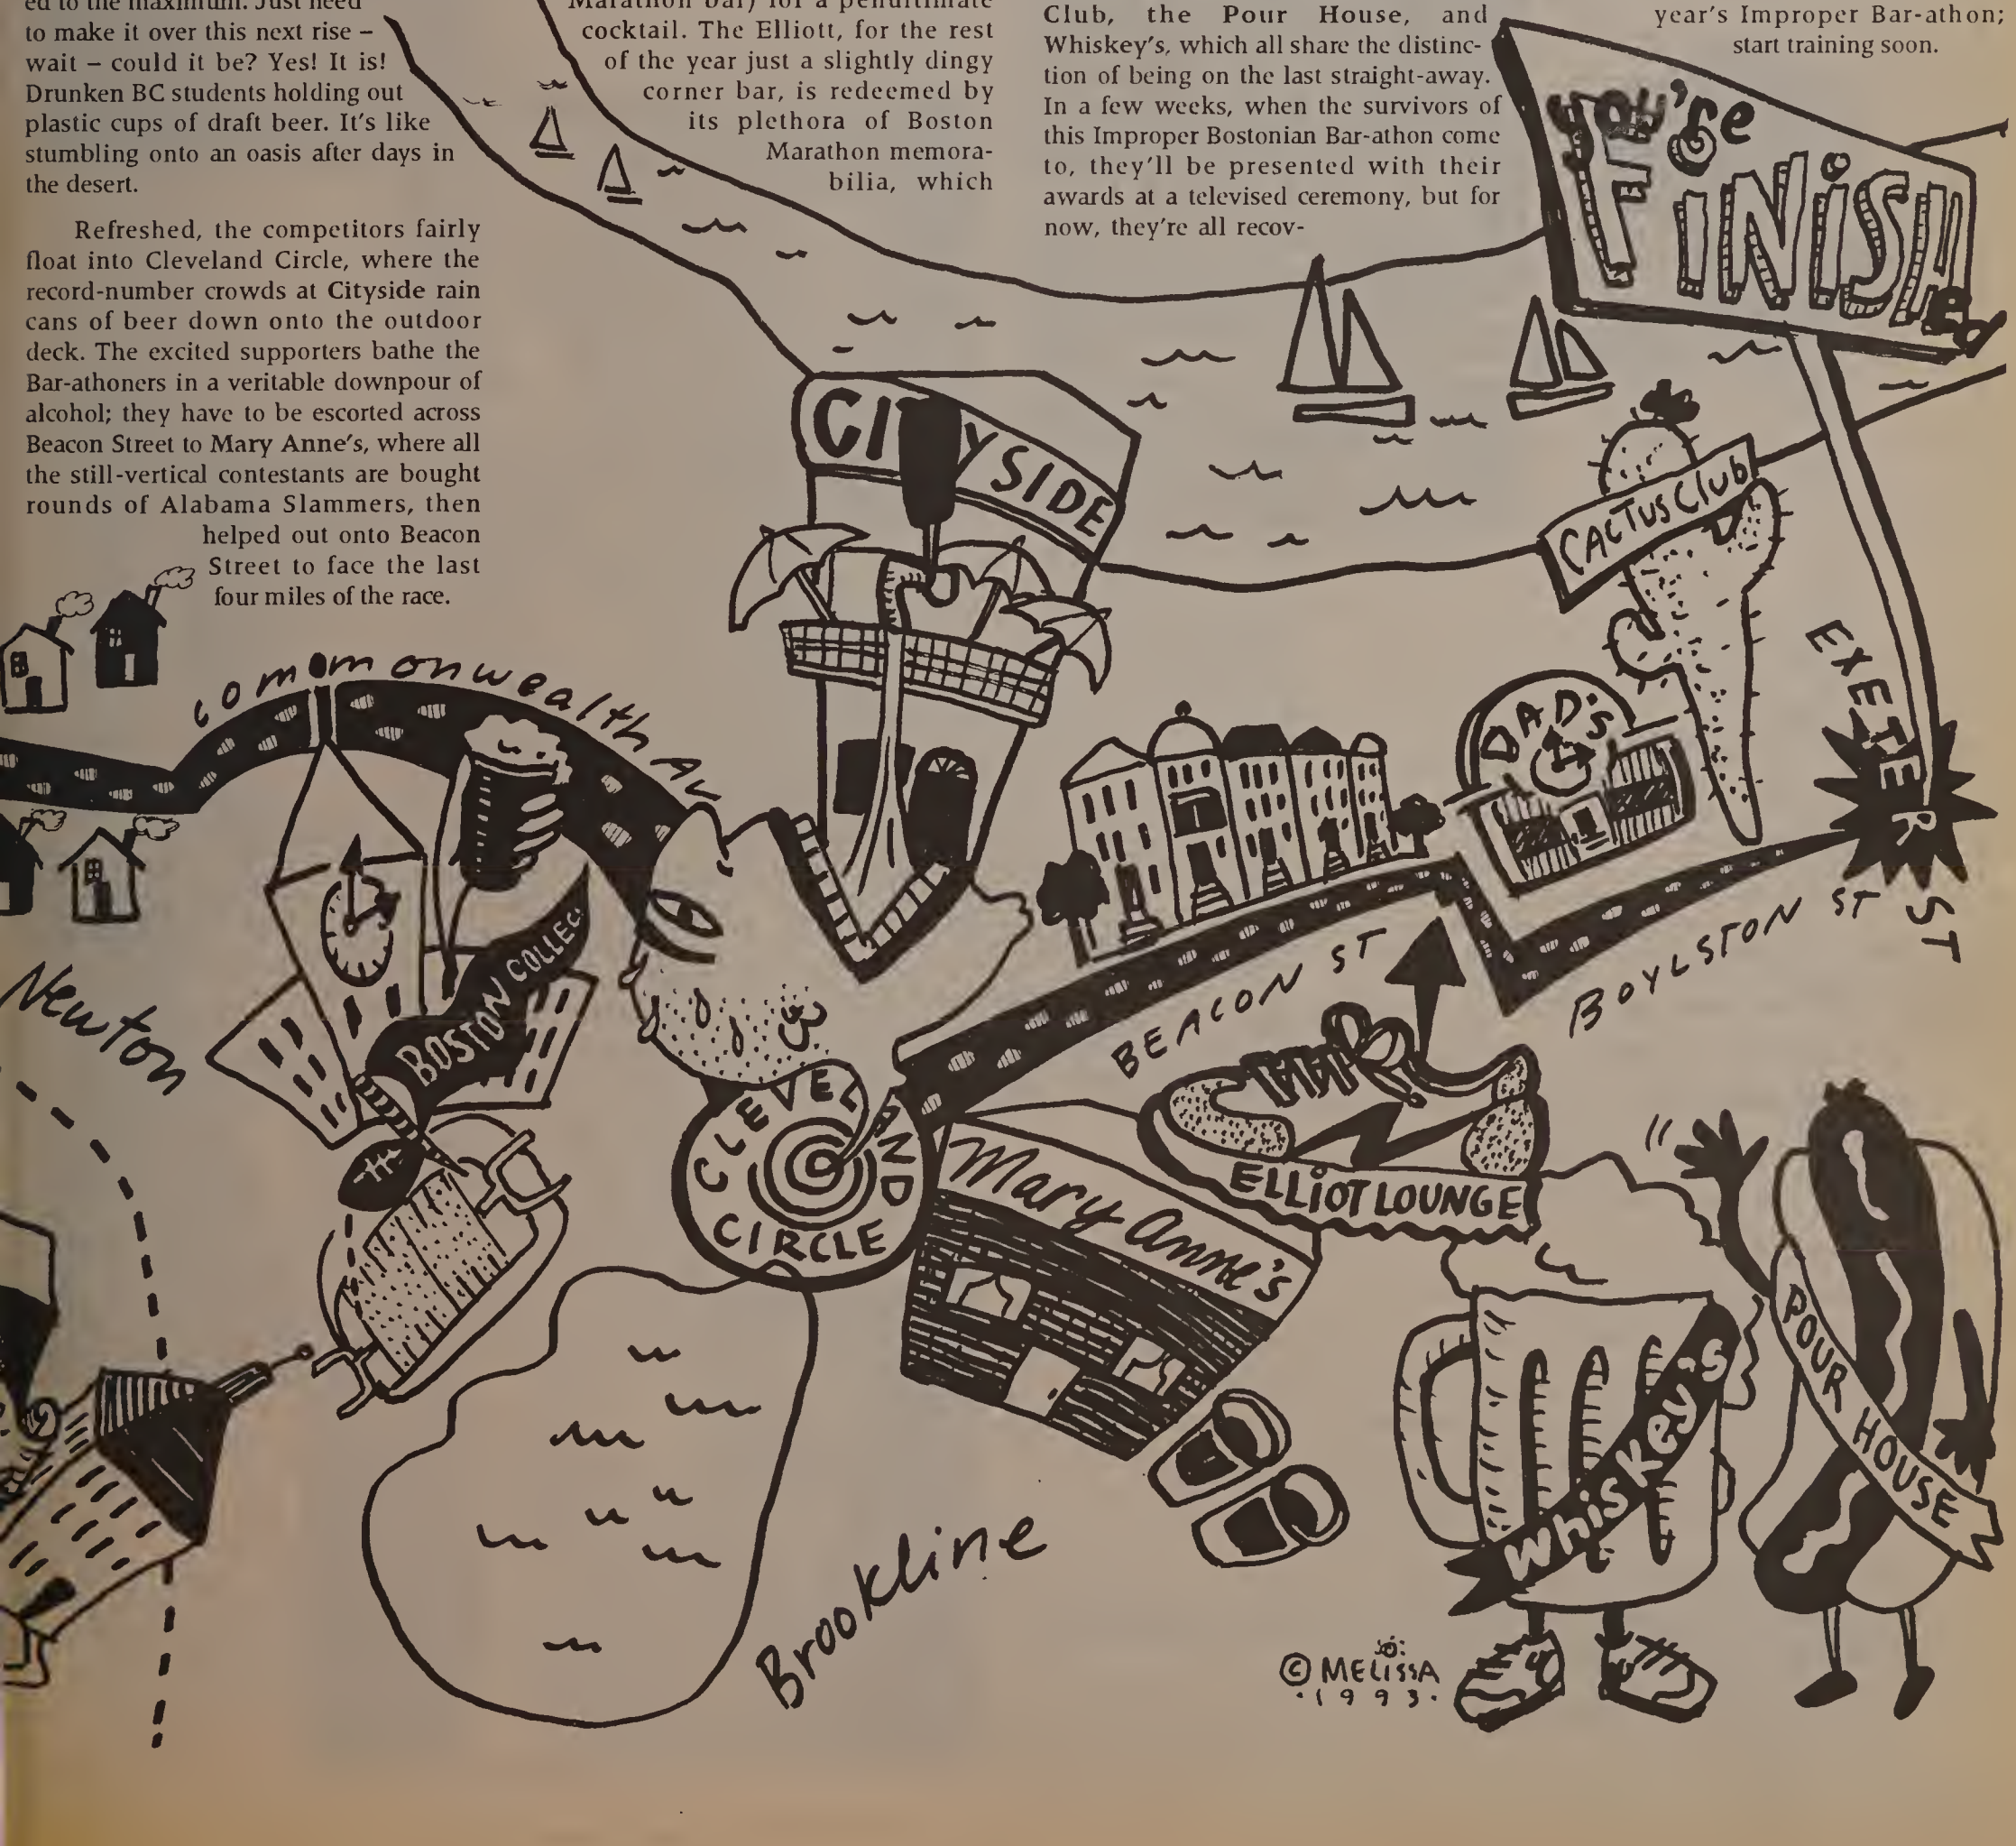
From the Happy Swallow, the Marathon route winds its way out of Framingham to Central Street, in Natick. Things are looking grim for the contenders, because Natick is a dry town – no bars. Some of the field look like they're really starting to suffer now, and there's no relief in sight.

Everyone looks longingly at the Town Line Liquor Store, and we lose two competitors to the promise of a cold six-pack and some Sambuca nips.

Miles 10, 11 and 12 roll numbingly by. The field reaches the halfway mark, and Wellesley College looms up on the right. Maybe there are some sympathetic Wellesley Bar-athon supporters who will help out the athletes with some liquid relief. The Wellesley women welcome the contestants with warm beer and wine coolers – please! But it's better than nothing, and slightly refreshed, the challengers push on.

Dying of thirst, the racers dash into the new Paparazzi in Wellesley Center for some over-priced and under-sized drinks. Checking the route map, they realize they are heading for the toughest part of the course: the last 10 miles and Heartbreak Hill. Who knows where they'll find the next bar? The field quickly decides to throw back a few more cocktails before easing off their bar stools, tightening their laces, and hitting the road again (some of them, face first.)

Beyond) BAR-ATHON the Beantown Race



At this point, the course leaves Wellesley and enters Newton. These are the agonizing miles of residential, suburban, bar-less no-man's land. Shin splints and blisters are nothing compared to blinding thirst. At Heartbreak Hill, some of the field start to hallucinate – neon Miller signs and tall frosty glasses of fruity alcoholic beverages appear at the side of the road. Endurance is being tested to the maximum. Just need to make it over this next rise – wait – could it be? Yes! It is! Drunken BC students holding out plastic cups of draft beer. It's like stumbling onto an oasis after days in the desert.

Refreshed, the competitors fairly float into Cleveland Circle, where the record-number crowds at Cityside rain cans of beer down onto the outdoor deck. The excited supporters bathe the Bar-athoners in a veritable downpour of alcohol; they have to be escorted across Beacon Street to Mary Anne's, where all the still-vertical contestants are bought rounds of Alabama Slammers, then helped out onto Beacon Street to face the last four miles of the race.

Knowing that the Finish Line is drawing near, the valiant but struggling athletes take heart, and push themselves to the limit, gaining three more miles to Kenmore Square. The crowds are going crazy, police lines are being overwhelmed, the end is so close they can almost taste it, but before they do, it's into the Elliott Lounge (which enjoys the reputation of being the Marathon bar) for a penultimate cocktail. The Elliott, for the rest of the year just a slightly dingy corner bar, is redeemed by its plethora of Boston Marathon memorabilia, which inspires the by-now almost comatose Bar-athoners.

The remaining racers are carried out bodily and hauled over the Finish Line by well-meaning spectators. Since they're passed out cold, none of the athletes knows who has won, nor do they particularly care, as their prone bodies are sprayed with celebratory champagne provided by Dad's Diner, the Cactus Club, the Pour House, and Whiskey's, which all share the distinction of being on the last straight-away. In a few weeks, when the survivors of this Improper Bostonian Bar-athon come to, they'll be presented with their awards at a televised ceremony, but for now, they're all recovering nicely at Seminole Point, knowing that they have pushed themselves to the limit and conquered one of the most challenging courses in Marathon history.

Admittedly, this form of contest is not for everyone, especially not for the faint-hearted or weak-livered. But if you're searching for a respite from all the physically exertive Boston Marathon hoopla, the field is still open for next year's Improper Bar-athon; start training soon.

HEAVILY MEDICATED FAERIE TALES

No, They're Not Shacking Up with Snow White

BY ROSS GARMIL

Once upon a time, there lived six funny people. They were happy, funny people who lived happily and funnily on their own; skipping, laughing, playing, singing, and, every now and then, performing elective surgery. And then, one day, one of the happy people said, "Hey. We're all funny. Let's be funny together."

They all liked this idea, and so they banded together to form a troupe of happy, laughing, playing, singing funny people who decided that elective surgery wasn't really their shtick. The other people said, "No, that's not right. People aren't supposed to be funny in a group. That's for one person alone to do with a microphone, and perhaps some props. Now that's comedy. This group thing is just sick." But the funny, happy people didn't listen to them.

"We don't care what you think," they said. "We like being funny together. And we don't have to stay here and listen to you. We're going to Boston!" And so they did, but when they arrived in Boston, the happy, funny people found the city to be much bigger than they imagined. They found that they could no longer just be called the happy, funny people, and this made them sad. Until one day, one of them said, "Hey. Let's call ourselves 'Heavily Medicated Faerie Tales.'" (Now you know why they're so happy.) This idea made them all happy again, so them and their name descended upon Boston.

You may not be familiar with the comedy of Heavily Medicated Faerie Tales, but you should try to change that. You see, metaphysically speaking, every sketch comedy troupe faces two challenges: writing funny material, and giving funny performances. Though HMFT's talent lies more on the performing end of the proverbial stick, they do succeed in both of these tasks, thereby providing the audience with an entertaining show.

This is not to imply that their writing is weak. From musical numbers such as "She's So Catholic" about a parochial student attending "Our Lady of Excruciating Chastity," to game-show spoofs like "Let's Piss Jerry Off," where contestants who succeed in angering poor Jerry win a "great big box full of lots of stuff," to a trip to the Monty Python-esque "Complex Café," where the waiter and anyone wishing to dine must adopt the nervous disorder du jour, HMFT's original and imaginative writing supplies the audience with fresh, off-beat humor.

But the true talent of this group lies within their performance, primarily because of the strong character work. Whether a monologue is being delivered by the blissfully ignorant Southie housewife, Peg, (who confides that her son-in-law "is Jewish – but I suppose he can't help that," and further tells that her son "[isn't] a bad kid. He just happened to be in the wrong place at the wrong time...with a gun,") or the "rotting corpse-like remains of Sir Richard Burton" is giving a dramatic reading of A Little Too Much Fun with Dick and Jane, or other tales are performed by a group of very demented "actors" named "The Guys Who Say 'Haaaaaay,'" the result is the same. The audience is presented with thoughtful, three-dimensional, hilarious characters rather than mere one-joke stereotypes, seen too often in skit comedy both live and on television.

And the moral of this story is: go see Heavily Medicated Faerie Tales, and you can live happily ever after, or at least for a few hours.

Heavily Medicated Faerie Tales performs at the Leland Center at the Boston Center for the Arts on April 21, 22, 24, and 25. Call 288-5585 for show times and reservations.

JOKE OF THE EVERY OTHER WEEK

George Bush, Bill Clinton, and Hillary Clinton all die and go to heaven. God asks each of them "Who were you?"

"I used to be President," Bush responded.

"I was just the current President," Clinton answered.

"None of your business," Hillary said. "And get the hell out of my seat."

Congratulations to Douglas Leighton of Boston for his bold effort of mailing in something funny. In recognition Douglas Leighton will be rewarded with two tickets to the Comedy Connection at Faneuil Hall.

Not a bad deal, huh? Well, you too can take part in this great offer. And what would you pay, $19.95? No, only 29 cents. Simply write your joke on a piece of paper, include your name and address, put the paper in an envelope, lick the envelope (just the part with the glue), place a stamp in the upper right hand corner of the front of the envelope and then in the middle of that same side write:

FLICKS IN A FLASH

Falling Down

Michael Douglas, sporting a crew-cut, glasses, white button-down shirt, and a pocket protector, abandons his car in a Los Angeles traffic jam and sets out on foot for home. After exchanging his briefcase for weapons, the man known only by his license plate D-FENS explodes when confronted with the familiar stresses of urban life. Is he an average white guy who has been pushed to the edge? Or is he an over-the-edge, vigilante sociopath? This movie is sure to strike a chord with anyone who has ever had a bad day.

Il Ladro Di Bambini (Stolen Children)

After a mother is arrested for prostituting her eleven-year-old daughter, a young military officer must escort the girl and her ten-year-old brother from Milan to a home for children in Sicily. Drawing heavily on the Italian Neo-realist tradition, director Gianni Amelio quietly chronicles their journey along busy, noisy highways, running past impassive soul-less high-rises. The three gradually bond with one another, and the officer realizes the extent to which the girl has been victimized: by her mother, by the men she serviced, and by the society that should be protecting her. Inevitably, he, too, becomes a victim. The characters are affecting (yet another nod to Neo-realism: both children were non-professionals), the pace is slow but steady, and the bright, bleak urban landscape is haunting.

Love Your Mama

Ruby Oliver, director, producer, and writer of Love Your Mama has the distinction of being the second African-American woman to have her film released nationally (the first is Julie Dash, director of Daughters of the Dust, the third is Leslie Harris, director of Just Another Girl on the I.R.T.). If only her semi-autobiographical story (about a Chicago mother who fights to hold her family together and help her daughter realize her dream of opening a day-care center) were more compelling. It has some winning moments, but mostly it moves stiffly, awkwardly, and Moma gives too many impassioned speeches. One would have been enough. The film never moves you or inspires you the way, one suspects, a couple hours in the company of Ruby Oliver would.

Rich In Love

The film opens with a fait accompli: wife and mother (Jill Clayburgh) has up and left. How her quirky and charming but vague family (that was probably dysfunctional even before she left) copes is what interests director Bruce Beresford. Kathryn Erbe is convincing as Lucille, the bright, appealing, but annoying high school senior who tries to control everything and everyone. Equally convincing is Suzy Amis as older sister Rae who returns home pregnant and married and not pleased. But together the characters amount to less than the sum of their parts. That they barely seem connected, let alone related, doesn't seem to bother anyone at all, and if they don't care, why should we? However, Charleston, S.C. is gorgeous; intriguing dark undercurrents occasionally surface, and Albert Finney as the dear, befuddled overweight patriarch knocked off his perch is a joy to behold.

Manufacturing Consent: Noam Chomsky and the Media

Directed and written by Mark Achbar and Peter Wintonick. At the Brattle Theatre, April 23-29.

Who would have predicted box-office success for Manufacturing Consent: Noam Chomsky and the Media, produced by Canada's National Film Board and co-directed by Torontonian Mark Achbar and Montrealer Peter Wintonick? With an unwieldy title, Manufacturing Consent is also forbiddingly long – 167 minutes – and unapologetically dense, political, and issue-oriented. The unorthodox choice of protagonist for this documentary is an M.I.T. linguistics professor, Noam Chomsky; and the highest point of drama is Chomsky's chilling retelling of a faraway war in the 1970s, the holocaust in obscure East Timor at the hands of the invading Indonesians.

Noam Chomsky in "Manufacturing Consent: Noam Chomsky & the Media" at the Brattle

Yet never in Canadian theatrical history have so many people lined up and paid to see a documentary. And the same phenomenon could happen – why not? – with the current release of Manufacturing Consent in the U.S.

What is Achbar and Wintonick's secret? The filmmakers follow Chomsky as he circles the globe arguing his left-leaning, often idiosyncratic analyses of political issues. And that's it. But Chomsky's rhetoric is so compelling and persuasive, and his unwavering commitment is so energizing, that Manufacturing Consent becomes a remarkably exciting film. Viewing Manufacturing Consent makes one feel privy to amazing information about how the political world ticks, and irate that the regular American media has kept this information away from its citizenry.

I saw Manufacturing Consent at the Berlin Film Festival in February, where the documentary played to packed, sold-out houses. Each screening ended with impassioned questions from the young German audience about Chomsky: "When does he have time to sleep, or teach his classes, or do linguistics? Does he ever lose an argument?"

Manufacturing Consent offers in Chomsky an appealing role model for empowerment at a time when many grass-roots activists need to believe that they can affect change. If Chomsky – one man, one voice – can take on the government, and the media, so can all of us make democracy work in the U.S.

Vermont is for Lovers

Directed and written by John O'Brien. At the Museum of Fine Arts April 17,18.

Harvard graduate John O'Brien, a native of Turnbridge, Vermont, took two out-of-staters, George Thrush and Marya Cohn, cast them as about to-be-married New Yorkers George and Marya, and set them loose to improvise dialogue among wizened rural Vermonters, who play themselves. The urgent subject of the made-up conversation: love and matrimony.

George and Marya are typically stressed-out, uptight, ambivalent, young yuppies, ready to break up one moment, ready to wed (nervously) the next. How long could it last? The Vermonters they talk to for advice have no such estrangements. Once you marry, you stay so for life. Yep. That's about it. And every one of them have been married for longer than Rip Van Winkle slept.

Don't expect A Midsummer Night's Dream out of this low-budget pastoral comedy, but Vermont is for Lovers is simple, unpretentious, and, often enough, lots of fun in a loopy anthropological way. The common-sense, monosyllabic New Englanders are especially amusing. And George Thrush, a Boston architect in real-life, isn't half-bad as the charmingly spoiled groom.

Banya

Directed and written by Chris Schmidt. At the Coolidge Corner Moviehouse.

The Boston production crew behind this ungainly experiment to make a feature in Russia must have been advised that foreign-language films are hard sells to distributors. Therefore, Banya is seventy percent in English. Well, some kind of English. The visibly uncomfortable Russian actors seem literally spoon-fed their (stilted) English dialogue. They appear to have little idea what the words mean, even less how to pronounce them. And why do they speak English anyway?

It seems that director-writer Chris Schmidt's quartet of over-the-hill, passive male heroes run away from home each summer and pretend to be a Chicago blues band. To feel American, they speak American. Where's the story? An American photographer, Sabine, comes along to inject some drama and sexual tension. Unfortunately, she's a bore also. And her 1970s drab clothes...was there a costumer on this unfortunate picture?

LIKE WATER FOR CHOCOLATE

Chocolate Magic

Pedro (Marco Leonardi) and Tita (Lumi Cavazos) have an illicit private moment in "Like Water for Chocolate"

BY KAJ WILSON

Any chocoholic intuitively knows what tests have proven: chemically speaking, eating chocolate is like falling in love. Mexicans even have an expression for the relationship between love and chocolate: "Like water for chocolate" means to be agitated or sexually aroused. True to its title, Mexican director Alfonso Arau's film Like Water For Chocolate, based on wife Laura Esquivel's novel of the same name, tells a tale of love, lust, food, and foment. In the tradition of Latin American magic realism, it mixes the supernatural with the mundane, and serves up a romance with a feminist flavor.

The de la Garzas are wealthy ranchers on the northern plains of Mexico in the early 1900s. Family tradition dictates that youngest daughter Tita (Lumi Cavazos) never marry but care for her widowed mother until death do them part. Mama Elena (Regina Torne), a wicked witch of a mother, forbids Tita to marry Pedro (Marco Leonardi), the love of her life. Instead Mama marries him off to the unappetizing eldest daughter, a woman as rigid and selfish as her mother but without her mother's limited appeal.

A dutiful daughter, Tita seems to accept her fate, but she can't and won't stop up her feelings, and she rebels covertly, using food as her weapon. She is a marvelous but unusual cook: her dishes express her deepest emotions and desires. The wedding cake she bakes for her sister at her mother's command makes everybody cry and throw up. A key ingredient in her quail in rose petal sauce (the meals are based on actual recipes) is her desire for Pedro, and the dish so arouses her lusty sister Gertrudis (Claudette Maille) that her body shoots off sparks which burn down a building.

Will Tita ever find happiness with Pedro? Will she ever escape her mother's clutches?

The story is told in an extended flashback by Tita's niece Esperanza (whose name means "hope") and a connection is made between Tita's inevitable domestic rebellion against her mother and the Mexican Revolution that is roiling outside. And the story certainly has a feminist slant: it champions feelings over tradition and gives us characters such as Tita, Nacha (a family servant), and even Mama Elena, who are strong and independent life-givers and domestic artists in their own right. The de la Garza women have a role in the man's world outside, too: Gertrudis leaves home naked on horseback in the arms of a handsome revolutionary, and she returns years later a general.

The female/domestic revolution versus the male/political revolution comparisons and connections are a bit vague and confusing, especially given that the worst villains are women, namely the mother and sister who mostly say to hell with feelings if they conflict with tradition. The film tends to play more as a fairy tale for adults about a good daughter and her evil stepmother and stepsister than as a shining example of magic realism.

Nonetheless, Like Water For Chocolate is a sweet dish, a romance with all the right fixings: flowers, lace and leather, candles (hundreds of them), beautiful scenery (the elegant domesticity of the de la Garza ranch is set nicely against the harsh beauty of the Coahuila Desert) and passionate glances. It's a dish that's almost as good as it looks. ❑

MAD DOG AND GLORY

An exhilarating odd-couple story that takes a smart look at the complexity of male bonding. Wayne Dobie (Robert De Niro), a shy evidence technician for the Chicago police, saves the life of loan shark Frank Milo (Bill Murray), who thanks Dobie with a temporary gift of the beautiful Glory (Uma Thurman). The romance that blossoms between the two is one of the few predictable developments in Richard Price's otherwise clever script, which fortunately focuses more on the relationship between the men. De Niro is convincing as an ordinary guy who longs to be an artist. Murray stands out as the charming, sinister, and unhappy Milo, who longs to be a stand-up comedian.

OLIVIER OLIVIER

Though there are no Nazis, nor heartbreaking scenes in the Warsaw Ghetto, (as there were in Europa Europa), director Agnieszka Holland's most recent film, Olivier Olivier, is far darker in spirit, and weirder. Set in contemporary rural France, the young Olivier rides off on his bike and disappears. A few years later, the Parisian police return a kinky Parisian teenager claiming to be Olivier to the bosom of a family that was screwed up even before his disappearance. Psychologically dense, the tale climaxes in black magic and mystery, with even a shaky claim to happiness.

POINT OF NO RETURN

The U.S. remake of Luc Besson's 1991 hit La Femme Nikita about a drug-addled she-punk forced to turn assassin to survive. The original had the look and feel of an American film: it was slick and violent. Director John Badham's version is an imitation of an imitation – minus the style and soft at the center. Bridget Fonda as the heroine, Maggie, doesn't have Anne Parillaud's feral intensity, but she's engaging and manages to rise above the mediocre material.

SOMMERSBY

When Jack Sommersby (Richard Gere) returns home from the Civil War after years of being away, his wife (Jodie Foster) is understandably wary: the old Jack was a drunk and wifebeater – this Jack is gentle and kind. The husband sets about wooing his wife, being a father to his boy, and restoring their Tennessee farm. Inevitably, his past comes back to haunt him. The movie works best as a love story. Less interesting is Jack's transformation into a community leader who champions a tobacco-growing scheme that promises to make his neighbors – black and white – prosperous landowners. It means too few domestic scenes and too many shots of tobacco plants. You may want to bring a handkerchief or pick up extra napkins with your popcorn. The ending is a wet one.

GROUNDHOG DAY

Bill Murray plays Phil Connors, a callous weatherman, trapped in time in Punxsutawney, Pennsylvania on Groundhog Day, forced to relive the same day over and over again. (Imagine waking up to I Got You Babe playing on the clock radio every morning.) If Phil (the Punxsutawney groundhog is also named Phil) was in a rut before, now he's really stuck. He finds, much to our amusement and his surprise, that endless repetition offers infinite variety and opportunities. In spite of himself, he changes into a decent human being. The lovely and clever Andie MacDowell shines; we believe that MacDowell could inspire anybody to change for the better.

SHOE BUSINESS

Boston Ballet's Cinderella

BY WALTER WADAS

Cut loose with the Boston Ballet for the next two weeks. That's when the company presents "Cinderella," a charming tale about the sex life of the foot and the shoe. Set down by Charles Perrault in the seventeenth century, the story is a natural for ballet, which is a foot and shoe intensive business. Moreover, the scullion to sweetheart via silica slipper neatly parallels a young dancer's rise on toe shoes to ballerina.

Boston, however, is not mounting a revisionist, libido-liberating production a la Mark Morris. Cinderella here remains a fairy tale and a fable. As Hiller Huhn, assistant to the director, says, "The fable allows Cinderella to experience her dream." Huhn's tone is nostalgic, almost plaintive, as he extols the ballet's fantasy: "People often cannot face reality. They have to find dreams to get them through."

Although the music sometimes sounds like some souring sweetness that Nino Roca might have composed for Fellini, Prokofiev's core isn't used as a source of dark ironies. In the tradition of Frederic Ashton, director/choreographer Ben Stephenson presents a straightforward story ballet.

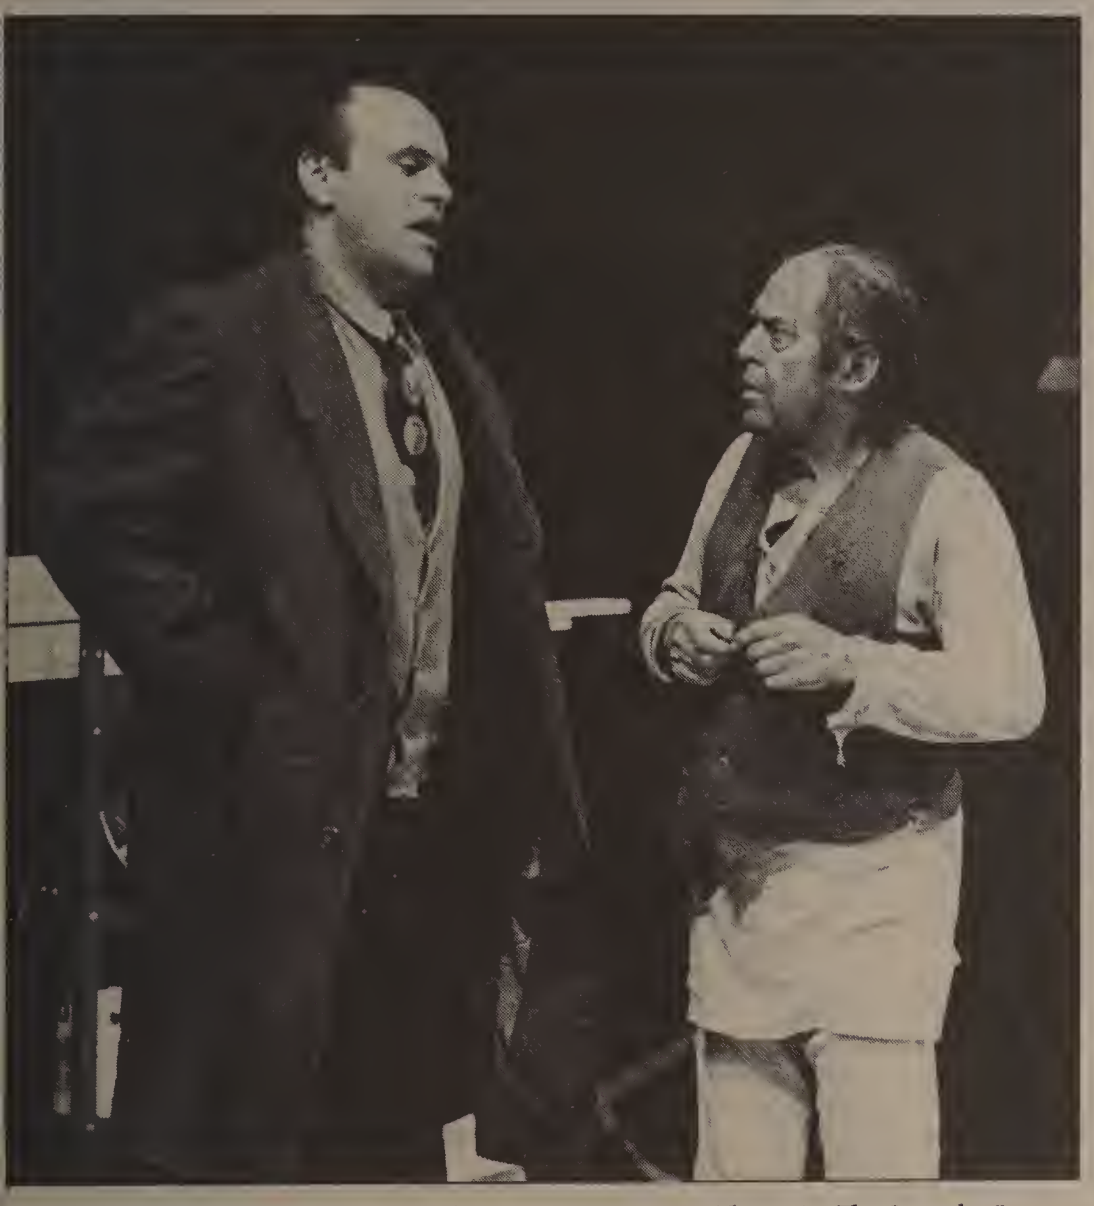
Fantasy and fable are there for the audience to enjoy at will. With emendation. In ballet, there are always idiosyncratic emendations. Prokofiev provided music for Cinderella's father—I don't remember him from my childhood story either!—but none for her stepmother. Stephenson finds a way to add this character.

Moreover, he casts the ugly stepsisters as men en travestie (that's "in drag" for us low-life). Huhn says the tradition of the English pantomime is the source of this cross-gender casting. As stepsisters, Boston Ballet's Laszlo Berdo, Karl Condon, Todd Eric Allen and Howard Merlin get to camp the parts in broad ways, absurd and farcical.

If that isn't enough, at some performances Laszlo Berdo plays a stepsister and at others he plays the prince. As he says, "I enjoy the opportunity to play a straight part as well a character role." Highlighting the "slight contrast," Berdo adds "one wears heels; the other doesn't."

Karen Scalzitti, who plays Cinderella to Devon Carney's prince and to Berdo's stepsister, seems to delight in the cross-gender casting. She says, "The dancers really get to have fun. Their actions are silly and exaggerated. It's all very funny."

Pointing out that the sales shop offers her used ballet slippers, Scalzitti remarks about the attraction to dancer's shoes. She knows of at least one admiring fellow who had a pair of hers. And the boys, Karl and Devon, have their admirers too, she says.



That puts the glass slipper on quite a different foot, proving, perhaps,, that not only Jerry Lewis can play "Cinderfella."❑

THE CARETAKER

Pinter's Masterful Drama on Brotherly Strife

Jack Willis and Jeremy Geidt in The American Repertory Theatre's "The Caretaker"

BY NANCY LEONARD

As one famous story has it, when playwright Terrence Rattigan saw "The Caretaker," he told its author, Harold Pinter, that he knew what it was about: "It's about the God of the Old Testament, the God of the New, and humanity." But Pinter coyly rejected the idea. "No, Terry," he retorted. "It's about a caretaker and two brothers." Well, either view, or any other between these polar opposites, would be just about as plausible. "The Caretaker" remains as impenetrable in 1993 as it was upon its first production in 1960.

That said, and story meaning aside, this revival at the American Repertory Theatre, under David Wheeler's impeccable direction, is splendid and compelling, perceptively weaving curt dialogue, comedy, and menace into a starkly atmospheric drama. The rhythms are resonant, and there's a dark subtlety to the whole. But mostly, it seems, the power of the acting is what makes the evening so commendable, particularly a tour de force performance by ART senior actor, Jeremy Geidt.

The action takes place in an upper story room of a West London house. Aston, who lives there, enters with a down-at-the-heels old man, whom he's just rescued from a fight. The attic room is littered with stacks of newspapers, assorted objects, and general debris. Under one pile, there's a second bed; and the visitor, who's been calling himself Jenkins for the 15 years since the war (though his name is Davies), is invited to stay. The next day, Aston's brother Mick comes upon the scene. He says he's the landlord, though his behavior is more thug-like than entrepreneurial.

Aston, laconic and impaired from electric-shock treatments, works with his hands. He's supposed to be decorating the place, but his real goal is to build a shed in the backyard. He thinks maybe Davies, whom he looks after despite being annoyed by his habits, can be the caretaker. Later, Mick advances the same proposition, but wants references. Davies repeats what we've heard before, and will hear later: his papers are with a guy in Sidcup, and if the weather would just break, he could get down there, prove who he is, get it all sorted out.

As the play progresses through its several scenes, Davies switches his allegiance from Aston to Mick, but that doesn't work out either. He can't fulfill the latter's dreams of making the old place a palace. Ultimately, the visitor becomes an outsider in a familial stand-off, and has to leave.

Although there's as much detail in the script as clutter in the room, Pinter's purpose remains elusive. The vivid details of this play give life to the evening's spare formulation, but are not particularly suggestive. What's going on probably has something to do with power and identity in an existential void. The work feels like Beckett's - Davies' running concern about shoes, for example, and his always-postponed trip to Sidcup - but there's less insight into heart and mind. Mick's alternating moods and manipulations link more generally to theater of the absurd.

The production catches the comedy as well as the bleak uncertainties in the work. Jeremy Geidt's cockney bum is a perfect evocation of a lost soul, resiliently continuing his lifelong struggle for a modest place in the world. He doesn't want to offend, but is not shy about making demands, and sizes up his shifting situation with a survivor's instinct. The actor turns a passage about a clock into a wonderful stand-up routine, and later kicks Aston's bed with splendid childlike resentment. His glimpses of victory are quite touching, and his losses come with strong feelings. Overall, it's a relaxed personification that doesn't seem like "acting" at all.

Jack Willis is superbly enigmatic as Aston, the taciturn, well-intentioned older brother, who is only too aware of his limitations. There's something chilly in his self-control; his benevolence is a question mark in the proceedings. His tightly-modulated, emotion-laden speech at the end of the second act is stunning.

Mark Zeisler, in black leather jacket, with a toothpick dangling sardonically from his mouth, is mostly edgy and explosive as Mick, despite the odd touch of concern. His second-act aria about decorative possibilities, linguistically out of his league, is startling.

Derek McLane's raked, thrust set backs up to a slanting roof with a narrow window, from which the final arresting image emerges. The costumes by Catherine Zuber and Kenneth Mooney are distinctly in character. John Ambrosone's moody lighting perfectly traces the action, while Maribeth Back's sound design enhances the mood.

Pinter's obscurity can be intimidating, and the subject of intense debate. But the ART's "Caretaker" is simply a masterful mystery. It deserves a return engagement after its very brief run. ❑

CELEBERITY GUEST DINING REVIEW

Casa Romero: Staying Power

BY JOYCE DELLA CHIESA

Stepping down into the grotto seclusion of Casa Romero, you feel the ambiance of a real Mexico City restaurant. Located right off the public alley on Gloucester Street, between Commonwealth Ave. and Newbury Street, the Casa is beautifully appointed with richly-colored tiles, bold looking Mexican high-back chairs (great for privacy), and various artifacts reflecting the rich heritage of Mexico, and the restaurant's owner.

Leo Romero, the distinguished looking and congenial owner of this eatery brings his love for the arts and traditional, family recipes to this romantic spot, which is now in its twentieth year. That is a long time in the Boston restaurant business, and there is a reason why: Casa Romero's consistency.

As soon as you are seated, you're served fresh salsa and real tortilla chips along with the menus. This salsa, which seems too hot at first, will have the most timid of palates asking for more. It's addictive. We enjoyed house margaritas (made with Sauza Gold Tequila at $3.75) and Mexican beer (there are several varieties, all at $3.75) while our friendly and bilingual waiter explained the specials and answered questions about the menu. If you can, enjoy the outside garden, which is one of the loveliest meeting spots in the city (it wasn't open yet at the time of this review).

For our appetizers we chose ceviche of fresh fish ($5) and chicken flautas with guacamole and sour cream ($4). Both were terrific. The ceviche consisted of perfectly sliced and cubed pieces of sweet fresh pollack, marinated with onions, jalapenos and lots of lemon and lime juice. The sweetness of the fish and the tartness of the citrus were in perfect balance. The flautas were crispy and delicious. They are made of flour tortillas, stuffed full of chicken, rolled, deep fried, then topped with beautifully creamy and flavorful guacamole, a touch of red salsa. The final touch was a welcome dollop of sour cream. A truly terrific dish, full of flavors and textures. We also sampled the mixed green salad ($2.50), which delighted us with a nice mix of radicchio and a variety of carefully cleaned greens served with a red wine vinaigrette.

For our main selection, we chose grilled fajitas of chicken ($12), deviled giant shrimp in a tomato and chipotle sauce ($16) and enchiladas poblanas of chicken with mole, cheese and sour cream ($10). We also ordered a very nice bottle of red wine, an '89 Coronas (Torres) Penedes from Spain ($16). The fajitas were served with warm soft tortillas so you could roll the tender, juicy pieces of chicken and sweet grilled vegetables inside. This is always fun to do and oh, so good. The shrimp were very large and tender. The sauce that topped them sizzled from the hot, smoky flavor of the chipotle peppers which blended perfectly in a rich tomato sauce. And we were delighted with our classic chicken enchiladas with mole. A rich and creamy dark sauce with smooth texture covered the enchiladas, which were sprinkled with a light amount of cheese and melted for a mouth-watering presentation. All entrees are served with Mexican rice and delicious refried beans.

We were so content and satisfied that we were ready to forgo dessert until told the special of the evening: a perfectly ripe half mango, beautifully presented in a pool of raspberry sauce and a dollop of slightly sweetened whipped cream ($4). We also tried the classic flan ($2.50), smooth, light, soft and creamy with a touch of cinnamon. Both were a delicious finish to another memorable meal at the Casa Romero. We look forward to our next time here. Maybe the garden will open early this year.

APPETEASERS

DOG'S DAE

The warm weather just around the corner ensures that Chip's Firehouse Ice Cream on Charles Street in Beacon Hill will soon be the coolest spot in town. With old-fashioned flavors like vanilla (made with choice bourbon vanilla beans, frozen pudding, maple walnut and pistachio sans food coloring), they deliver tastes from days gone by. However, what makes this place very, very special is their attention to their canine clientele, serving Boston's only "doggie sundae." That's right – topped off with a mini-doggie-biscuit, veterinarian approved.

Mondavi On the Move

BY JONATHON ALSOP

These Mondavi people just will not quit. Already a huge force in Boston (and everywhere else), they've adopted a new motto: when you compete against yourself, you always win. In 1987, Mondavi bought Vichon Winery and then bought the legendary Byron Vineyards in 1990. Vichon and its second label, Vichon Coastal, have been in Boston for a while, but always on the back burner. Now Mondavi is releasing Byron in Boston and only nine other markets, so the push is on. We re-tasted some Vichon and tasted the Byron for the first time recently; the Vichon was very good, except for the vain '88 Cabernet Sauvignon and its asking price of $25. Every one of the Byron wines was outstanding, especially the Sauvignon Blanc, all at very good prices. These will be the wines of summer around here, and as far as I'm concerned, Byron could easily beat Mondavi if they keep on like this.

• '90 Vichon Chevrignon (50/50 blend of sauvignon blanc and semillon), $9: beautiful green aromas, lively and herbal, deep flavors, tastes like rain, smells very good.

• '91 Byron Sauvignon Blanc, $10: a serious bottle of wine, strong exotic aromas of tropical fruit and wet stones, fantastic flavors, crisp explosive citrus, gorgeous body, can't stop thinking about this wine, my new favorite.

• '91 Byron Chardonnay, $14: aromas rose as we poured and hit me from a distance, huge nose of vanilla, butterscotch and pear, perfect acidity, persistent butter and cream; never tasted the Reserve, but it's hard to imagine it could possibly be any better than this. When you see it on sale for $11, buy big.

• '90 Byron Pinot Noir $14: big nose of fruit and spice, very lean and focused with sharp acidity, a little simple right now, still twice the wine you'd get from Burgundy at the same price; easy to imagine the Reserve could be better, though.

• '88 Vichon Cabernet Sauvignon, $25: dark color, some creamy fragrances, dried fruit flavors, oddly lifeless, tasted over two days and went nowhere fast.

Fine Wine On A Tight Budget

Beacon Beverage, Brookline: '90 Buehler Zin $7, '89 Goosecross "Estate" Chardonnay $9 (not the regular chard for $7, in a nearby rack), and '90 Bel Arbors Zin an incomprehensible 3/$12 given its quality in a famous vintage.

Winecellar 2000

The turn of the millennium is one of those "buy-now-drink-later" scenarios no wine lover can resist. Let's start our hypothetical 21st century winecellar with a case of '89 Domaine Chante Perdrix Chateauneuf-du-Pape, a beautiful CdP in a stellar year, from Brookline Liquor Mart, about $200. Tremendous now, better later, and by 2000, the Chante Perdrix will have maximum flavor, maximum smoothness, and maximum price.

Westport White

Winemaker Bill Russell, from Westport Rivers Vineyard just outside Boston, has fashioned a delicious and affordable blend called Westport White from chard, botrytis-affected chard (if you can believe it!), riesling and pinot blanc. The result is a very full-bodied white with deep, creamy fruit, soft citrus and great acidity. The botrytis – a main component in French Sauternes – contributes a little bite, as well as a mild lingering heat on the tongue. Absolutely outstanding, beautifully twisted into uniqueness. To compare, Westport White is like Cotes-du-Rhone white or Aussie semillon, only stronger, and with its own distinct personality. Available at the vineyard and Marty's (April is American Wine Month), $8. ❑

INTERVIEW

A Candid Conversation With Diane Modica, Commissioner for the Mayor's Office of Consumer Affairs and Licensing

BY MARK SEMONIAN

For the past nine years Diana Modica has been Commissioner for the Mayor's Office of Consumer Affairs and Licensing. Her responsibilities include granting entertainment licenses for Boston's bars, clubs, restaurants and arenas. She is a lifelong resident of East Boston and is currently a candidate in District 1 for the Boston City Council.

I.B. What types of changes have you witnessed in entertainment in Boston since you first began your job as commissioner nine years ago?

D.M. We've seen a proliferation of comedy clubs, there's probably been a tripling of them in the city. Boston's always sort of had an underground reputation for spawning some real comedic talent, i.e. Jay Leno, but I think now we've become part of the comedic loop nationally, for both importing and exporting talent.

[Some] identified the Euro market and said "Gee here are some kids that have some money to spend," they began to attract them by moving from one club to the next and offering services as production companies. They were drawing them to various clubs. Paradise and Avalon got the first wave of the Euro kids. The production companies are now being integrated into or scooped up by the existing clubs.

I.B. Is the club business cleaner today than it was nine years ago?

D.M. I think we have established a fairly high standard of operations and a level of expectations with club owners. It's been a long road, but we've worked very closely with the Boston Police Department to make sure that there is a uniform application of the licensing standards across the city. We have two Boston Police detectives that work with us, they have become the enforcement arm for us – they carry out over a few thousand inspections a year. Their presence has been established in over 800 places across the city. I think the standards of performance have improved because of that.

Business plans have been improving. We let them [the club owners] know that we expect them to put in writing what it is that they plan on doing and how they are going to maintain order on the premises. We ask them to think of their format, how they will advertise and promote it. There have been times when people have engaged in advertising that has created huge lines of persons waiting to get into the clubs. We ask them to think of on site security and communicate this to their staffs.

I.B. What does it take to compete today in the club business?

D.M. Most of the people who are successful network within the neighborhood and understand how city agencies work. They've become good corporate citizens, they invest in the community, they sponsor charity events. They've fine tuned their marketing. Customer service and satisfaction is always stressed.

I.B. What's the most outrageous request you've ever received for licensing?

D.M. What seemed crazy yesterday seems to be normal today. The bungee scene seemed to be outrageous to us. It seemed to be fraught with risk. And after checking around, we found that this was being done throughout the country and around the world.

I.B. I read somewhere of the new human bowling trend in bars, where patrons strap themselves inside a life-sized bowling ball and their team mate bowls them into six-foot tall pins.

D.M. People are looking for some sort of impact in their lives. I would suggest they look inside themselves as opposed to outside for the impact. It's almost as though people have become numb to the world and they're looking for something to sort of bang them in the head and say "you're alive!" All this need to feel "impacted" is I think being taken in a direction that's maybe a little more risky than need be.

I.B. Does that mean we don't need alcohol?

D.M. Most people don't have a problem with responsible drinking.

I.B. Is there any chance that Boston clubs will ever close later than two in the morning?

D.M. Ah, how come I knew this was coming up? Suffice to say, Boston is a neighborhood city and there are a few places where there are not residential homes located adjacent or close by. [Her voice takes on a stern tone.] I think there's a conflict between the needs of people to sleep and the desires of people to party. In addition, the liquor licenses are regulated strictly, they can not go beyond two a.m.

The fact remains that people have to sleep, people have to get up early in the morning to go to work and the police are also limited in their resources. Beyond two a.m, there would be public safety issues that might require the police to be called for assistance. And I think the neighborhood people have something to say about having the police deployed at 4:30 in the morning for a club closing as opposed to being on duty in the event that they need them for some other matter.

I.B. Does the Boston lifestyle need more European influence?

D.M. Yes, absolutely, this European Bistro trend, where people sit and people watch. It's good for our health. As people, we have to slow down, we need more time to relax, to reflect and to really enjoy and be with the moment. I don't do enough of that, and I'm sure most people don't. But the European influence is helpful.

[Boston could benefit from] the Mediterranean culture, with it's love of food; [also] Paris, Rome, and the Greek islands. But also the Irish pubs, they're very friendly places, and people there are generally interested in Americans, they love to talk with you, and they're just very affable people.

I.B. What does Diane Modica do when she goes out at night?

D.M. I go for functions, I don't necessarily go out to party at a club. I like restaurants, I like eating good food. I like the movies,.. I like the live theater.

I haven't tried Kareoke yet, I'd have to do that in the privacy of my own home before I'd even dream of getting up in public. And concerts, but not always.

I.B. So, chances are that we're not going to see you on Lansdowne St. some Friday night dressed up in grunge?

D.M. You never know – hope springs eternal. ❑

JESUS JONES

The Next Revolution Will Be Computerized

BY DAVID FENIGSOHN

Jesus Jones don't play rock and roll. "We don't really play traditional instruments in the accepted sense; there aren't any traditional guitar, bass or drums," says Iain Baker, who plays a sampler for the English fivesome, in a recent phone interview from England. "We play guitar lines into the computers, which are then messed around with. On the album, there is no live guitar at all. If we took all the samples off the album, you'd be listening to an a cappella album with [lead singer Michael Edward's] voice on it and nothing else."

The result of these efforts is Perverse (SBK/EMI), a cutting edge techno/rock /pop/dance sound that finds the band utilizing technology while retaining their abandon and excitement.

"Since everything is sampled, people think 'Oh, my God, it must be a really boring dance record' or it must be cold and clinical, but it is not. You can't just say, 'computer, churn me out some songs.' It doesn't know what to do. You have to have the songs in there to start. Garbage in, garbage out is the classic thing with computers," he continues. "You can't just throw a load of rubbage in their and hope it is going to write a masterpiece for you. Which is why the whole idea of using computer generated sounds works. The human element was there right from the genesis of the album. And I think that is reflected in the way it sounds."

Baker samples the guitar of Jerry De Borg, the bass of Al Jaworski, and the drums of "Gen" into a dozen tight, pulsating, dark, anti-nostalgic songs. Only singer-songwriter Edward's vocals remain unsampled.

Sample the tunes (and fashions) of Jesus Jones

Baker says a common misconception regarding the band is that their use of sampling creates a boring live show. "The computer will load up the same samples on the keyboard, each night," he explains. "But the way I play them each night could be completely different, and it frequently is. The way I play certain guitar lines or certain violin lines changes day to day in the same way a guitarist knows he has to start off with a certain guitar pattern but times he changes it perceptibly. That sort of thing can happen with sampling as well."

Therefore, Baker says, sampling is as valid a form of expression as can be obtained from any other instrument. "Samples can come from absolutely anywhere," he says. "The whole thing about them is that it doesn't matter what they are to start with. What makes it so interesting is you can be driving down the road, and a motorbike will go past, and you will hear the noise and be like, wow, what a noise. Wouldn't it be great to take it out of the context it is in, and change it around, and put it in a place where it shouldn't be.

"For example," he continues, "repeat the noise three time over a bar. And that is the beauty of sampling. And that is where it comes in to its own. It's not like we listen to a record and be like 'That was a nice drum fill, we can take that out and put it on our record.' There is no point in that for us, we like to take things from strange and wonderful sources."

The samples are added to a much darker album than 1991's Doubt, which made Jesus Jones instant stars with the hit "Right Here, Right Now," another anti-nostalgia song. Baker believes Perverse is a significant step forward.

"The songs on Perverse are perverse. There has been a rise of cynicism. They are slightly left of center, there is something confusing about them. But at the end of the day, they are much more rewarding. They are much more lasting."

The stand-out tracks include a tribute to the technology which the band is based on, "Zero and Ones," and the current single "The Right Decision." But the album's most compelling song is "The Devil You Know."

"'The Devil You Know' is a complete loathing of nostalgia," Baker says. "The whole point is we are not being given a choice anymore. There is so much retrogression going on, so much emphasis on the past and what has been done before. People feel safe with what has been done before. We are only being given the devil you know, we are not being given the devil you don't know. What we advocate on the whole album is the devil you don't know. What if it is more rewarding than the devil we've all ready got? What if it opens up more possibilities?" ❑

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY

New Takes On Old Wonders

BY STEVEN D. BROWN

Throughout history, composers have adapted works by their predecessors to accommodate both the instruments and performance style of their own times. It is a sure sign that the period instrument movement has come of age when ensembles like the Handel and Haydn Society, which specialize in such an approach, begin presenting Handel as arranged by Mozart and Bach reworked by Mendelssohn, which is precisely what Christopher Hogwood has programmed for H & H's final pair of concerts in Symphony Hall.

Felix Mendelssohn is credited with resurrecting Bach's major choral works in the early nineteenth century. On Friday, April 16 at 8 p.m. and Sunday, April 18 at 3 p.m., H&H will present Mendelssohn's 1829 version of J.S. Bach's "St. Matthew Passion" with David Gordon, Richard Zeller, Dominique Labelle, Marietta Simpson and Paul Elliot in the solo roles.

Two weeks later, in a faster than usual turnaround, Hogwood returns to Symphony Hall with H&H for Mozart's orchestration of Handel's "Ode for St. Cecillia's Day." Sharing that program will be C.P.E. Bach's Symphony in B flat and J.S. Bach's motet "Singet dem Herrn." Soloists in the Handel, which L'Oiseau-Lyre will later record as part of Hogwood's ongoing series of Handel's works as arranged by Mozart, are Lynne Dawson, John Mark Ainsley and William Sharp. Performances are on Friday, April 30 at 8 p.m. and Saturday, May 1 at 3 p.m.

Ticket prices for all concerts range from $17 to $45 and are available through Ticketmaster (931-2000) or the H&H box office (266-3505). For frugal concert-goers, one-to-a-person rush seats are available for one hour only at the Symphony hall box office for $6 beginning at 5 p.m. before the evening concerts and at 12 p.m. before the afternoon concerts. ❑

PIPeS
PERMAGRIN RECORDS

Musically, PIPeS have nothing that really distinguishes them from the hordes of college bands who produce similar pop noise. The sound is just too familiar: basic, three-chord post-punk, and a singer whose voice can't always cover the necessary territory, but tries real hard anyway. Fortunately, they've managed to string together a collection of tunes catchy enough to keep them from being relegated to the circular file. "Shake" sounds like INXS getting mugged by the Chili Peppers, and "Burn" is an unpolished gem. When vocalist Jeff Robbins murmurs, "I don't want to die, maybe I do...burn, burn, burn," he seems resigned to his confusion; you can picture him throwing his hands up in despair with the rest of the Generation X-ers. Their press package states emphatically that you can dance to their music, but that's no endorsement; you can dance to "Achy Breaky Heart," too. PIPeS has the ability to move you when you're standing still; we'll see if they can expand on that. Maybe they'll finally capitalize that "e" in their name when they properly capitalize on their talent.

DILLON FENCE
MAMMOTH RECORDS

As the final scabs of Seattle peel off music's wounded knee, Chapel Hill, NC's pulsating core of seasoned rock bands are finally creeping out of the wings. Recorded with native producer Lou Giordano at Cambridge's Fort Apache, they've upped the strings and kept the edges a bit frayed. Not as published as last year's Rosemary, Outside In relies less on calculated formulas and ventures with spontaneity and live performance (prime Giordano motifs).

"One Bad Habit" adopts the best fretwork of Bob Mould and the soaring harmonies of Teenage Fanclub and creates perfect ear candy. Although the retro 70's ballad "Any Other Way" could pass for another love song by Mr. Big, Dillon Fence has the chops to prevent it from drowning in smarmy pulp. Not all the songs work, however. "Waking Up" lacks direction and vision. On the whole, however, Outside In is a solid sophomore effort that should send record companies scurrying for the next shuttle to Chapel Hill. It seems like pretty soon everyone will be looking over Dillon Fence.

KEVIN LEE & THE LONESOME CITY KINGS
MCA RECORDS

The first sentence of their press release to know what to expect from Kevin Lee & the Lonesome City Kings: "If you're in the mood for a hard-working, no-nonsense rock & roll band, look no further..."

That aside, the biggest gripe with these guys (besides that cumbersome moniker; couldn't you have picked something a little shorter?) is that they are just painfully average. They're not bad; they all seem to be fairly proficient on their respective instruments, the singer's got a decent-enough voice, the production quality is good. But what's the point?

Musically, lyrically, stylistically, they pilfer every rock & roll cliché in the book. Apparently, "no-nonsense" is synonymous with "no-creativity;" there is absolutely nothing here that hasn't been done a thousand times before. If you need to know what they sound like, think .38 Special or reasonable facsimile. Perhaps the title Restless was meant to refer to their effect on the listener.

THE BOSTON CAMERATA
THE AMERICAN VOCALIST: SPIRITUALS AND FOLK HYMNS, 1850-1870
JOEL COHEN, DIRECTOR
ERATO

Besides exploring the music of medieval and renaissance Europe, Joel Cohen has pursued a parallel path with the folk traditions of the Americas. It was, in fact, with folk music that Cohen started as a performer, before discovering the likes of Machaut and Dufay.

In his latest venture with the Boston Camerata, Cohen recreates what may well have been a Sunday afternoon's entertainment at a social gathering in a mid-nineteenth century New England home. The material on this program ranges from rustic, austere harmonizations that echo the spare, functional architecture of a New England church, to a genteel setting of "Shall We Gather at the River," alluringly sung by Anne Azema and Elizabeth Anker.

MENDELSSOHN:
INCIDENTAL MUSIC TO A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM
LYNNE DAWSON, SOPRANO; SUSANNE MENTZER, MEZZO SOPRANO
ROTTERDAM PHILHARMONIC
JEFFREY TATE, CONDUCTOR
EMI CLASSICS

The incidental music that composers wrote to accompany plays functioned in much the same way as does today's film music. Mendelssohn's score to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" is preeminent within the genre. Given the current economy, mounting a full production of this play with music is beyond the budget of most theater companies. This two CD set, containing both the play (with a few minor cuts) and the complete music, is the next best thing to being there.

The Peter Hall Company aptly conveys Shakespeare's comedy , with a suitable variety of colorful accents to highlight class standing. Tate's well-paced reading of Mendelssohn's score evokes its elfin magic and weaves seamlessly amidst the action. This would be a fine gift for a young person with a developing interest in music, theater or both. For those wanting only the concert suite, Yoel Levi and the Atlanta Symphony's Telarc recording (paired with the Italian Symphony) deliver pointed, light-handed readings of each.

THE BRADY BUNCH
IT'S A SUNSHINE DAY: THE BEST OF THE BRADY BUNCH

Unless you're living in a bellbottom—proof cave, you have probably noticed that there has been a Brady Bunch revival that only seems to be getting bigger. The most recent wide-collared chapter in this polyester saga is a CD release that features the Bradys performing songs made famous by their t.v. show, plus several unreleased cuts and other tidbits for diehards.

One of the most amazing aspects of this album is how so many of its songs are such successful rip-offs. For instance, on the previously unreleased "Cheyenne" Barry Williams (Greg) sounds so much like David Cassidy that you might think someone put on a Partridge Family album while your back was turned, and the Maureen McCormick (Marcia)/Chris Knight duet "Road to Love" is simply a teeny-bopper's version of "The Wedding Song."

There are some duds on this album such as the saccharine (and slightly nauseating) "Merry Go Round" and the barely tolerable cover of "American Pie," but there are some real charmers, too. Susan Olsen (Cindy) sings a sweet, lispy rendition of "Frosty the Snowman," and Florence Henderson's campy attempt at country twang on "Bom to Say Goodbye" is a real hoot.

DAVID AVERY

DEPECHE MODE
SONGS OF FAITH AND DEVOTION
SIRE RECORDS

Depeche Mode have spent the better part of the past decade or so carving out quite a niche for themselves. The fact that they've been in our bedrooms so long gives them a level of audience intimacy that recent acts can't achieve. Watching Tori Amos lament or Nine Inch Nails rage, one feels a bit like a sheepish interloper; it's like watching someone cry on the subway. But Depeche Mode is an old friend; they can sob in our presence, and we love them more for it.

Depeche Mode clearly hopes this to be their Achtung Baby, a point of self-reinvention after numerous years and albums in their signature style (even the CD's booklet smacks of U2's latest: black and white photos of the band in studio and in various seedy surroundings), but it goes beyond added instruments and Gahan's newly-sprouted long hair and whiskers. Like the female models in their videos, with their sharp cheekbones and cruel mouths, D.M.'s music has always been beautiful, but cold. In Songs of Faith and Devotion they are finally writing about love as a feeling, instead of as a concept.

About Last Night...

Giorgio Armani Restaurant/Bar Where the Hip Get Hopping

BY LAUREN DARE, AKA THE LAST CALL LADY

The hipper-than-thou crowd has a new mecca on Newbury Street, and it's certainly what the free world needs: another trendy boite where you can rub shoulders with the relentlessly upscale. Yes, it's the Giorgio Armani Express, located in the block between Exeter and Fairfield Streets on Newbury. I don't deny that there is a niche in the market for a restaurant/bar like this one; after all, these poor people need somewhere to regain their strength and refresh themselves after dropping $500 for an Armani T-shirt next door at the retail store.

EMPORIO ARMANI EXPRESS RESTAURANT/BAR

214 Newbury St,
Boston
437-0909

The immaculately over-dressed clientele of Armani is willing to put up with a few minor discomforts, such as sitting at tables the size of a large pizza that stick rather uncomfortably out in the middle of the bar traffic, and being waited on by a staff wearing outfits that resemble little Mao Tse Tung jumpsuits.

Despite these minor grievances, the coolly blase clientele all appear thrilled to be here, at least as thrilled as coolly blase people can be. Everybody is wildly overdressed, mostly in black and white. Everybody smokes, and everybody tries to look as sophisticated as possible while lamenting the fact that they "should have been in New York this weekend."

The bar/cafe downstairs functions primarily as an accommodation for the spillover from the restaurant upstairs (both close at midnight on the weekends), so this is not really the place to end your evening. No one is drinking enough, for one thing – everyone is too afraid of losing their cool demeanor. It would be mildly hilarious to get loudly and obnoxiously drunk in Armani just to gauge the shocked reactions, but believe me, dahlings, I just don't think it's "done" here.

Another thing – Armani just doesn't strike me as a great place to scoop a date. Everyone at the bar seems a little self-obsessed, and my guess is that they probably just go home and have sex with themselves (ahem). However, if you're embarking on a viciously chic night out on the town, Armani is the perfect place to start, especially if you have a date who will pay for everything.

Here, should you indulge, are the rules for "doing" Armani: pull up out front in an expensive car of German make; valet park, but be careful to ignore the valet when he opens your door for you; enter sweepingly; drop your coat on the floor, wait for one of the waitstaff in their Third World bellhop uniforms to hang it up for you; give your name to the Maitre d'; slip him either a $20 or your phone number to ensure you get a good table upstairs, then announce that you'll be at the bar. Order, without looking at any one bartender in particular, an Absolut martini, and see how long it takes to arrive.

That accomplished, sit back to sip and observe the scene without looking like you're actually checking anyone else out – if you're caught looking, it implies that you're a) impressed, b) jealous, c) interested, d) any or all of the above, and of course the correct answer is e) none of the above, if you're truly sophisticated. When the Maitre d' comes over to tell you that your table is ready, you can sweep grandly up the stairs to disappear into the upper reaches and enjoy some complicated pasta. If you follow the Golden Rules, and don't embarrass yourself with any major social faux pas, you too can easily start off a successful and enchanting evening in this paradise of the terminally chic. ❑

BY ROCKIE GARDINER — APRIL 14 - 27, 1993

GENERAL FORECAST (If you know your ascendant, read it too)
Is it "all clear," are we safe? Maybe even "all-knowing," once-aggressive Mars convinces secretive Pluto to spill the beans this Friday. Covert military plans could be as plain as that line in the sand. (Remember Saddam Hussein?) After the hectic Easter weekend any supportive aspect between those explosive planetary forces is welcome, and an ever-so-friendly Mercury Venus conjunction on Sunday might seal the deal with a kiss. Exuding charm and wit, writing love letters (in the sand?) can make the last days of Aries borderline memorable. Taurus begins Monday at 9:49 p.m. On Tuesday media-minded Mercury opposing Jupiter brings more great ideas from great minds beamed to an ever-widening audience. The Taurus new moon is exact on Wednesday at 7:49 p.m.: take a secretary for dinner and toast a symbiotic relationship that works. Loving Venus turns direct (after six weeks of retrograde reflection) on Thursday, fanatical Neptune turns retrograde for the next five months that afternoon and erratic Uranus follows suit on the 26. The immediate worst is over, the rest is yet to come, the earthquake is scheduled for May 9. Make new-moon magic and meditate, or medicate if that's what it takes.

ARIES (MARCH 20-APRIL 19)
Unrest at home is squelched by using resources you can share a stash in the cookie jar? There's tremendous satisfaction, justification if you will, in probing an issue that'll complete a cycle of your own sexual revolution. As Pluto trines your horny Mars ruler, you might uncover his/her/your hidden agenda and the symbolic value of this relationship. But if sex magic isn't your thing, then you may discover something about taxes, profit sharing or investments that'll get you off instead.

TAURUS (APRIL 20-MAY 20)
Earth angels such as you speak your piece, make peace this weekend when Mercury and your Venus ruler meet to greet friends and associates. Is it simply a party or the political party line you're throwing? Eloquent and incisive, persuasive and positive at the Taurus new moon, but your inner glow doesn't shine through until Venus turns direct on the 22. Then relationship issues that have lingered (or languished or just lain there like a lox) for the last six weeks come back to life, as do you. Happy re-birthday.

GEMINI (MAY 21-JUNE 20)
You're on the glory trail while your Mercury ruler, at the top of your solar chart, puts you at the top of your form. If you're a maven of the media, (and what Gemini isn't?), you can have a tremendous effect because charming Venus sitting on Mercury gives you greater appeal whether you want it or not. You're also smarter, subtler and more optimistic, and what you say about home life, real estate and family issues will be heard. The Taurus new moon inaugurates a new friendship or political alliance.

CANCER (JUNE 21-JULY 22)
Romantic reconciliation and sexual satisfaction this weekend simply by following basic instincts. Sounds like a well-worn recipe for disaster, but because Mars makes one last stab at deep, meaningful passion before it leaves your sign on the 27, you can create, maybe even recreate a hot relationship. The motivation may not be apparent, yet you manage to find the words to quell the doubts and the good sense to make a reservation at someplace special. New career moves after the Taurus new moon.

LEO (JULY 23-AUGUST 22)
Stability when you least expect it from a problematic partner, respect from a critical elder and may be a ticket out of here. The Taurus new moon focuses on greener pastures, foreign shores the running of the bulls in Pamplona? This calm spell following the recent chaos shifts your attention to long range goals and lifelong dreams, something solid and, if possible, permanent. Until 'you attain it however, there's this financial matter which seems to be growing before your very eyes.

VIRGO (AUGUST 23-SEPTEMBER 22)
Like Gemini, you're practically irresistible this week, whether you're pitching one good-looking partner or wooing the public at large. The tendency to exaggerate, the urge to promise more than you can deliver, however, can be a blot on your pristine conscience should anyone be cruel enough to call you on it. The Taurus new moon makes earthly realities much more palatable, (potable, too) particularly when someone else is picking up the tab for creative projects and recreational purposes.

LIBRA (SEPTEMBER 23- OCTOBER 22)
Get the info on a health matter, talk a coworker back on track and charm the pants off a trainer at the gym. As Mercury joins up with your Venus ruler, well-chosen words can convince anyone to do anything as long as it's socially redeeming. Unfortunately, it's the down and dirty stuff that'll bring in bucks and enhance your reputation as one mean mother. Speaking of mean mothers, if a parent or boss offers a reward of sorts, take it. It's true value becomes apparent later.

SCORPIO (OCTOBER 23-NOVEMBER 21)
Finally, a rewarding trine between the two planets that rule your sign macho Mars and manipulative Pluto so no matter what state you're in, you'll make out fine this week. You might actually see one of your fondest wishes come true, something that has nothing to do with anybody else's money or power of influence but your own. The Taurus new moon means that a relationship is about to develop, but if you feel like stating your case this weekend, while you've got the gift of romantic gab, go ahead.

SAGITTARIUS (NOVEMBER 22- DECEMBER 21)
A positive, pleasant event happens at home or to the family this weekend. Call the folks, check around. As Mercury opposes your Jupiter ruler, you could learn something of real value that'll lead to another aspect of your career. Are we clearing the bookshelves, making room for a desktop publishing project? The Taurus new moon in your house of romance and risk promises you'll have fun (and because it's Taurus, make money), but isn't someone always making promises, exaggerating your potential for success?

CAPRICORN (DECEMBER 22-JANUARY 20)
Not quite exultation and excitement, just the sort of quiet satisfaction Goats appreciate. As the sun sextiles your Saturn ruler, you might get concrete confirmation that something good is coming from the good earth. You could save money on real estate, get money from/for Mother Nature or simply grow a garden of earthly delights. Pleasure is primarily wordplay, but there can be true physical satisfaction if you explore the taboos society and a sexy friend lay down on Friday.

AQUARIUS (JANUARY 21-FEBRUARY 18)
A stagnant situation at work may clear up; psychic plumbing can do wonders for your boss or dad's health when pushy Mars trines Pluto, the roto rooter of the solar system, on Friday. The sun supporting Saturn in your sign strengthens your stamina and sense of self worth. Mercury and Venus in your money house combine to get you the best deal, and the new moon in Taurus suggests soon there'll good times with old school ties. The 26 could be upsetting your Uranus ruler turns retrograde, be careful.

PISCES (FEBRUARY 19-MARCH 19)
Hold on to whatever clear glimpse of the future you get this week because once your Neptune ruler turns retrograde on the 22, you'll spend the next five months sorting through projects, feelings and people from the past. While charming Venus and mercurial Mercury meet in your first house, your magnetic appeal is newsworthy, especially if you have a publicist or lawyer on your case, promoting your cause. The Taurus new moon means the annual infusion of bucks is about to begin; whether you buy or sell seems irrelevant as long as goods are being traded.

IMPROPER IMPERSONALS

Feel the urge to unleash your frustrations or vent your hostilities on an unsuspecting friend or enemy? Look no further than the Improper Impersonals, a forum designed for pranksters, irate neighbors, relatives, maniacs or any would-be target of your acid tongue. Best of all they're FREE! Send your Impersonals to us at Improper Impersonals, The Improper Bostonian, 17 Station St., Suite 7A, Brookline, MA 02146. Or fax it to us at 232-4305.

Robbie,
I looked up the word "loser" in the Dictionary. It said that it would have had a picture of you, but that you weren't even worth the effort of illustration. Too bad, it would have been nice to have something to put on my dart board. Well, maybe if I ever have them when we meet face to face I can just aim for the zits. Have a nice day.
Debra

Jamie D.,
You're the best thing that's ever happened to me, without your love I'd be lost. Thanks for all the times you listened when I needed someone to talk to. You're my love and my life forever and always, babe! I LOVE YOU!!
Jen

ABE,
My love for you has gone deeper and deeper. If I don't get with you soon and let you freak me I think I will burst.
Love, B.

Uncle John,
Jesus is NOT here. Your band puts me to SLEEP!
P-King Wanna B (NOT)

The Anti-Mike Bandwagon is recruiting new members. If you believe that "Even a little Mike is too much," please call 232-3507 and ask for Laurie.

Ray,
Do us a favor. Go stand next to a large brick wall, concrete would be all right too. Face the structure; place your two hands on the wall, palms down, about six inches over your head; tilt your head towards the wall at a 54 degree angle, slowly pull your head back to a 132 degree, and then rapidly thrust you noggin against the wall. Repeat process until you lose consciousness. When you awake do the whole thing over again until there's more of your blood on the wall and sidewalk than coursing through you veins. By that time you should be dead, and we'll owe you a favor.
Love,
Karen & Tabby

To the AMB's, I realize that it is so appealing to jump on the anti-Mike bandwagon, but you have to know that I will triumph in the end. You may think that I'm conceited, but that's just because none of you will ever have me. You may think that I have no taste, but that's because none of you will ever have me. And finally, you may think that I'm not as cute as some of the other men in the office, but that's because none of you will ever have me. To the men of the bandwagon, I know the only reason you are doing it is because you don't want to upset the women. One last thing: I think you are all the best people anyone could ever hope to work with. See ya H-man.
Mike

Goliath
The marines stormed Normandy Beach almost fifty years ago, and do you know what happened, most of them were killed. Maybe I'm one of the lucky survivors, but not for long. Sorry to leave you without someone to dump on, but on the other hand, it's better to be dumped than to be dumped on. Take it from somebody who knows.
The Dumpor

Larry L.
You cold-blooded beast! You tried to eat Kari, and expect me to just forgive and forget? Why, you scratched him, and now he's probably going to oxidize or something!
Carol

Melissa,
I can read your mind like I can smell a fart in the car. I will see you at the Rat soon.
Your pal,
Paul from Revere

To the manager of the Café,
Where did you learn your business skills, from Rebecca on Cheers? You're the worst organizer of any show I've ever seen. Seven minutes? What the hell can anyone accomplish in seven minutes? It would take seven minutes to get a fucking beer opened in the pothole you call an establishment. What the hell were you thinking, that no one would mind paying $20 for an evening to find out that the people they went to see wouldn't be allowed to go on stage. Thank you very much for the least entertaining entertainment I've ever been forced to endure. You're terrible, your place is terrible, and you probably smell bad, too.
A concerned consumer.

Harv-
NO!!! Don't go, don't go, don't go. Well, I guess that it's too late for that. You're going, and we're going to miss you. Just don't forget about us when you're big and famous. Maybe you can include us in some sort of acceptance speech or something. Take care of yourself. Sorry the writing wasn't better on this, but I couldn't keep from smudging the pages with my tears. Farewell, sweet prince.
R.G.
P.S. Was that heartfelt enough for you?

Dave
You're a taskmaster. See if I ever let you play with my toys again anytime soon. Making me work so hard like that. I just can't handle it, I tell ya. I'm too young, I'm too delicate, I'm too beautiful, I'm too tired. You know, we can't all be as perfect as you. But, please, master, not the guilt. Anything but the guilt. You know, some people like to sleep once in a while, you slave driver.
Sincerely,
Your ever so humble servant.

This Mike/anti-Mike thing is lame and pathetic. Please desist, already. You all look foolish.

I really don't think either of the two major parties (Mike/Anit -Mike) suit my needs. Therefore I'm going to support Ross, the independent candidate.

Kathleen,
Your name is a great work of art that deserves to be in print. Kathleen, Kathleen, Kathleen, Kathleen, Kathleen. I just can't seem to get enough of it. Kathleen, Kathleen, Kathleen. There, now you're an honest to God celebrity type person.

This is the aforepromised retraction of earlier literary usage which could possibly be misconstrued as a "slur" against your character. The word "asshole" was in no way meant to reflect upon your actual character, but was indeed intended to illustrate the manner in which the AMB had earlier described you (although not in so many words.) I also wish to not, through this retraction, to be seen as a Pro-Miker. The point of my efforts was to formally declare neutrality. I am the Switzerland of the office. I will not join either of your organizations and will not take any stance on the personality of any member of our little family other than to state and restate that I am one hell of a great individual.

It's A (Magnificent) Dump!

Move over, Fresh Pond, land of hikes and bikes – there's another enormous open territory in Cambridge built on the site of a former landfill that feels to be as big as the moon. This is the single largest piece of open space in the city and you feel it, not only in the gigantic green sweep of its 50 acres, but also in the fact that parts of the town that otherwise seem very far-flung and disconnected can be seen hanging out at various edges of it, making Danehy Park seem like the universal perspective-maker. It rises enticingly from the edge of Sherman Street to a sort of turtlenecked hill, which leads gracefully, and eventually, down to the area near the Fresh Pond Cinema.

Aerial view of Danehy Park. Inset: landfill prior to closure (c. 1980).

The park, green and lovingly-landscaped with trees and some bushes whose winter plumage boasts lipstick-red stalks, is loaded with ballfields, soccer fields, basketball courts (all of which need to be reserved), a tot lot, and an interesting outdoor exercise court. Unlike Nautilus, these boards are horizontal and tilted, and these rings, monkey bars, and metal grabbers are a sort of "Nautiless" which offer the chance to exercise and stretch outdoors without needing the moving parts of gym equipment; pictures explain how to use them and many can be done from a wheelchair. Around what seems like the very edge of the world are bike paths and jogging paths; this little Colorado-within-Cambridge has picnic tables, parking, and bathrooms. Danehy Park has increased the city's open space by 20 percent, and it's all free.

Say What You Feel, Listen To What You're Hearing

Couples who go into couples therapy are looking for help with specific problems that are seen as negative and painful. Paiirs, a long, juicy immersion in a highly-structured group course for couples, comes in from another angle. It assumes that those same "problems" can be considered in marital or relationship "health" as easily as in times of "sickness" and developed as skills of intimacy. Paiirs teaches couples to slow down their interactions, and to use structured means of communication in order to bypass the usual hurt and panicked reactive route ("Oh my God, you're wounding me, and besides you're just like my mean father...").

One such method is the Dialogue Wheel which neutralizes fights by setting up an interview process, with sentence completion exercises: "I resent..I'm hurt by...I'm puzzled by...I regret..." to be used by one partner while the other one, trained in the patient, receptive/curious attitude of "Active Listening" assumes the responding role; then they switch roles. This organized stroll of exploration culminates in a "Request for Change," which, by the time it arrives, has been transformed from (in a let-er-rip argument) a blaming shriek into a measured expression, neatly arrived at in a shared way. It's an asking-for rather than a railing-against.

Exercises that are designed to foster a vital, daily now (and not the musty laundry of accumulated, unresolved yesterdays) are taught and practiced. In other parts of the course, consideration is given the separate self and history of each partner. Fair fighting is taught and elaborate contracts that attend very specifically to the vulnerabilities of each person are developed.

Some of the Paiirs experience involve men and women talking among themselves. The next course, which costs $1200 per person (cheaper by the hour than therapy, at an hourly rate of $10) covers 120 hours, on various weekends. Next course, different in time distribution, begins in September.

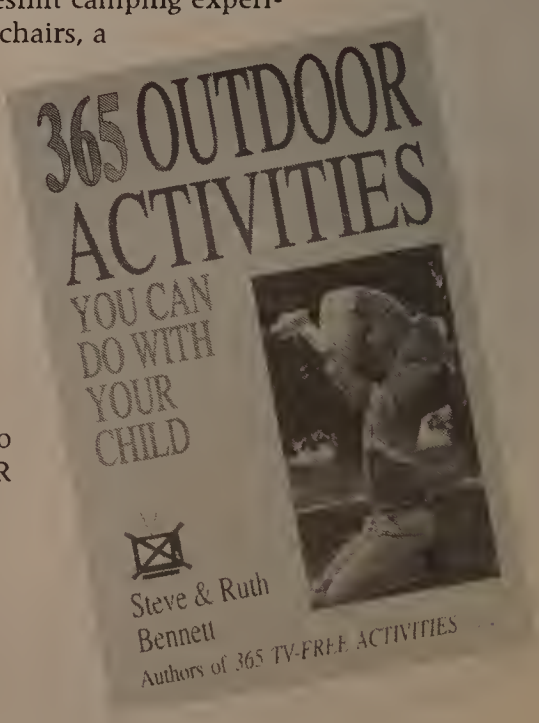
Little House On the Big Ingenuity

Before there was the disc, the dial, or the plug, there was the curious imagination of children, and that's what this book, 365 Activities You Can Do With Your Child by Steve and Ruth Bennett, calls upon. In a teacherly/parental way, you can unleash your kids on the world around them, making a sort of scavenger hunt out of the ordinary. The game they call "Mostest and Leastest" has kids finding the longest driveway, the smallest shrubs, the most steps on their street – installing "new eyes" in their daily meanderings.



Sports that are stripped of the usual equipment or strictures of location include bowling with soda bottles, tennis without the net (or the racquet for that matter), or a water slide created on the lawn with a wet shower curtain. In imitation of those man-made measurements called "Smoots," seen on the Mass. Ave. Bridge (which were named for a man of the same name who was used as a human measuring stick) kids can inchworm-out the driveway, the distance between parking meters, anything – and name that measuring stick a "Rachel" or a "Becky."

In "People Watching," the fine art of nosy speculation are honed by getting kids to observe people while imagining things about their situation, their relationship, their work – the sort of everyday projective tests that rule life, friendship and romance forever. "Resident Expert" inspires kids to make note of details in the immediate neighborhood – architectural details, local flora and fauna, nature – and figure out facts like the amount of rainfall or the day of the turning leaves.

They propose games that cause children "too tired to walk" to painlessly develop mini-goals ("I see something blue; why don't you run to it?"). The backyard lends itself to a make-believe, makeshift camping experiences (with a would-be tent made from chairs, a stick, and a draping sheet) and humdrum signs and license plates are crying out to become scrambling and anagram games. And science experiments (like "cooking" a white strip of paper and a black strip of paper on a hot day to discover which cooks the hottest) make vivid and workable the otherwise-academic.

Kids can name buildings after their uncle, or spell out their names in grass seed. One day at a time, kids can come to see the real truth in the idea that "Toys R Us."

6 Whatcha Gonna Do When She Comes For You?

Investigative reporting ain't pretty work. It involves in-your-face tactics, antagonistic interviews, hours of endless research. In short, this is a job you have to love. None of this is news to WHDH's Hank Phillippi Ryan. Find out the inside scoop on what makes this reporter tick.

Improperly Yours

Mim Michelove

I first met Hank Phillippi Ryan a few years ago, when I was a reporter for a monthly magazine in Worcester. Typically enough, Ryan had just blown the lid off of a local story, involving a woman driving on a license suspended for drunk driving. My story was supposed to report on the case; it turned into a piece on how the media covers and sometimes creates the news.

At the time, I remember being impressed with Ryan. Here was a woman, a journalist, who was faced with the most unpleasant scenarios. The accused in the case I was covering, for example, expressed herself only in four-letter words and shrieks, sometimes lunging physically at Ryan and her cameraman.

How Ryan handled the situation really made me re-think my position on women and power. It may sound obvious, but until then, I had never seen a business woman exhibit power without taking on masculine qualities. That Ryan managed to do this was impressive; even more so, considering that investigative journalism is one of the last male-dominated segments of generally non-sexist journalism.

She handled herself with strength, determination and quick wits, all the while remaining feminine – what more could you ask from a role model? Thanks, Hank.

Improperly yours,

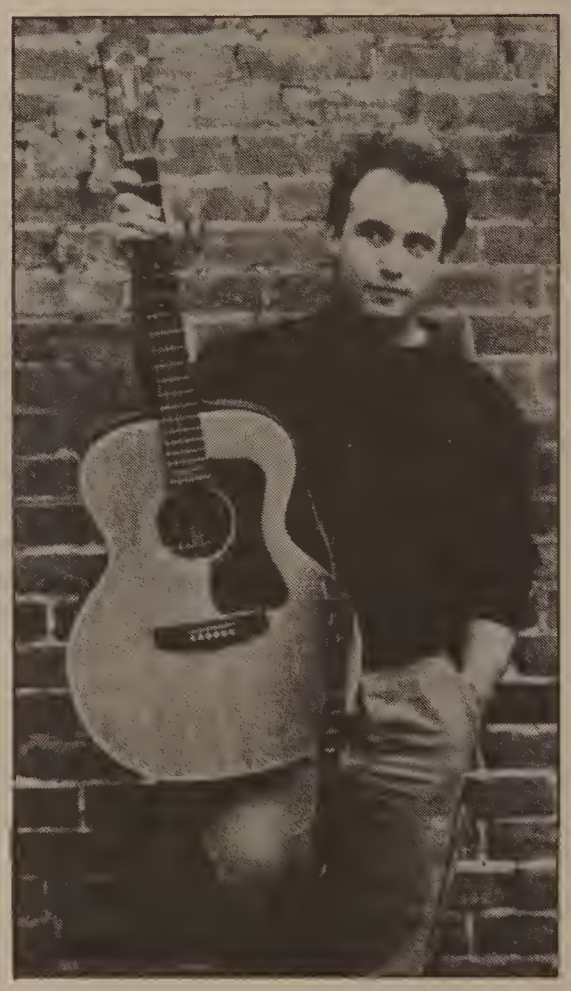
JIM INFANTINO: SERIOUS GUY

Acoustic Moves Overground

BY MATTHEW A. COHEN

Folk singer Jim Infantino is a serious guy. How serious is he? He's so serious, he wrote a song called "Serious Guy," in which he sings "You wonder why I wasn't at your party/I was busy deconstructing Hegel." It takes a truly serious artist to sing such lyrics, accompanied only by a thumb piano (the silliest instrument known to man), and still maintain a brooding expression.



Being the serious guy he is, Jim sings heartfelt songs about loneliness, the government, and death. He sings about Ernie and Elvis, his overweight cats. He also wrote lyrics to the Peanuts theme.

Jim isn't just another depressing folk singer. He's a damn funny depressing folk singer. He looks like that kid who's been nodding off in class when he first realizes that he's being called on – not so much scared as just slightly surprised.

Even Jim's more serious songs still use humorous passages. Likewise, his funny songs sometimes have dark twists to them. In the basically humorous "How Do I Look?" he chants, "Do I look okay?" over and over, like a teenager's mantra. It's funny, but it is also so relentless that it's a little unnerving, too. It's the sort of song that Kafka would enjoy.

Although primarily a singer/songwriter (whatever that means), Jim still works wonders with a cover song. Plus, he's one of the few folk artists singing grunge tunes. "I guess it's kind of breaking the rule but I think it's great to be able to play that kind of music and change people's perspectives. They're just songs," Jim says. The more serious he is when singing songs like "Smells Like Teen Spirit," the funnier he is. "The words are hilarious...if you can figure out what [they] are. 'A mulatto/an albino/a mosquito/my libido.' That's great!"

Jim, a winner at this year's Acoustic Underground competition, started a band called "Jim's Big Ego" that lasted for only one performance. "The [logo] was me with this enormous, swelled forehead. I thought we sounded pretty good." Jim is currently recording his new disc, "Strawman," with some "Big Ego" members. Fans of Jim's spontaneous, solo concerts may be surprised to hear some old tunes with new backing instruments on the record. "It's still me and the guitar, but in the past I've been afraid of obvious drum parts...I've been afraid of the snare. I've had snare-a-phobia."

Although he formerly spent much of his time touring, Jim Infantino is now sticking mainly to the Boston area, where he is building an impressive following, as word of mouth about his captivating performances spreads. Although originally from New York, Jim got his start in Boston's largest performance hall – the T. "I failed miserably on the streets," he says. " [To make it] you really have to play 'American Pie.' I was kind of subtle...Maybe I was asking people to think a little more than they wanted to between subway stops." Relax, Jim, you've made it out of the underground. ❑

Jim Infantino will be performing at Songstreet Productions' Funny Songwriters Festival at 7 p.m. on Sat., May 1 at the Somerville Theater in Davis Square. Tickets are $11.75. Call Songstreet Productions at 628-3390 or Ticketmaster at 931-2000.

JOKE OF THE EVERY OTHER WEEK

A bear and a rabbit were taking a crap in the woods. The bear said to the rabbit, "Say, rabbit, does shit ever stick to your fur?"
"Why, no," the rabbit answered. "It doesn't."
So the bear wiped his ass with the rabbit.

Congratulations to Joshua E. Blumenthal of Sharon, Mass. for his rather rude Joke of the Every Other Week. In celebration of his somewhat twisted humor, Josh will be given two tickets to the Comedy Connection at Faneuil Hall.

Do you wish to bring joy to multitudes of people? Have you ever said to yourself, "Gee, I love to see people read. And I love to see people laugh. If only I could see them read and laugh at the same time, well, then would I feel content in this imperfect world." Then, don't just sit there, take some initiative. Send in your joke (with name and address included) to the:

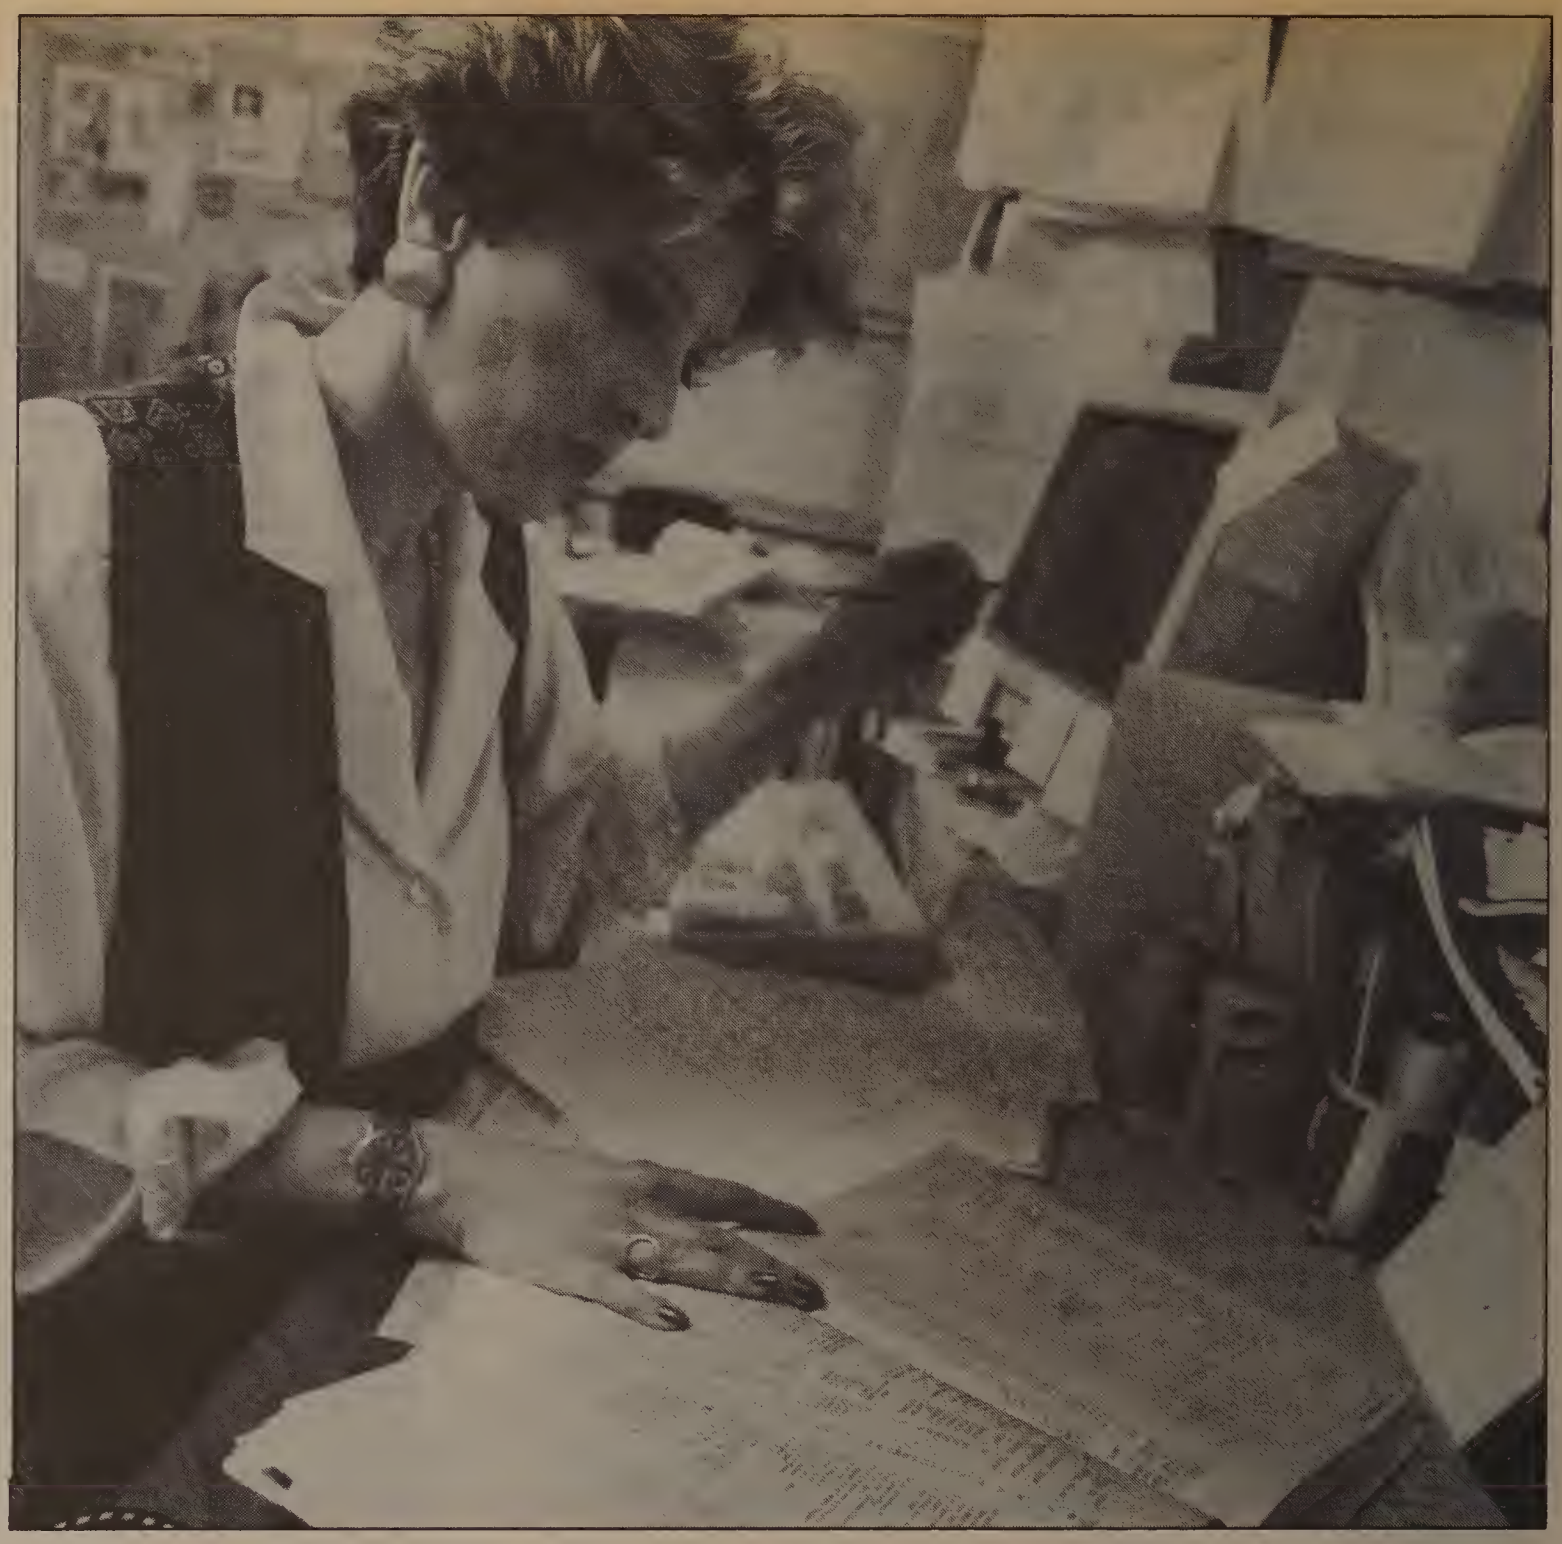
AROUND TOWN

The Boston Marathon has come and gone, but pianist Alfred Brendel's current U.S. tour is something of a marathon itself: he is performing all 32 of the Beethoven sonatas. For the final performance in the Bank of Boston Celebrity Series, Brendel will play five sonatas in Symphony Hall on Friday, May 7 at 8 p.m. On the program are Sonata in A-flat, Op. 26; Sonata in E-flat, Op. 27, No. l; Sonata in C-sharp minor, Op. 27, No. 2 (Moonlight); Sonata in C, Op. 54 and Sonata in C, Op. 53 (Waldstein). Tickets are priced at $30, $27, $24 and $15 and are available at the Symphony Hall box office, or by calling SymphonyCharge at 266-1200.

The Fabulous Thunderbirds and Boston's own Heavy Metal Horns will perform at Avalon from 7-11 p.m. on Friday, May 7 at the Second Annual "TomorrowNite" gala, benefiting St. Jude's Children's Research Hospital. The goal of "TomorrowNite" is to give children hope for tomorrow and give guests a night to remember. The benefit is expected to draw 1000 guests who can dance and dine on delicacies from Boston's hottest restaurants. A $50 ticket admits guests and helps raise money for critical cancer research, which helps children in New England and around the world fight cancer and other catastrophic diseases. For tickets and more information, call 1-800-341-5800.

They performed for over half a million people at Max Yasger's farm during a 1969 concert in Woodstock, New York. They've had one gold album and two platinum albums. After 25 years together, they've been seen on stage and screen by oodles of people worldwide, and now is your chance to add your name to that list. We're not talking about Crosby, Stills, Nash, & Young, or The Who – we're talking about Sha Na Na. Since that Woodstock performance (and their subsequent appearance in the Woodstock album and movie) Sha Na Na has also appeared in the movie version of "Grease" and on their own prime-time variety television show. Since their show went off the air, these crazies have been on a constant worldwide tour, which is coming our way. Sha Na Na, with its six remaining original members (unfortunately Bowzer is not one of them), and three new ones, including the new "greaserette," will be appearing at Ovations in Peabody on May 1 at 7:30 p.m. and 10:30 p.m. For tickets, call Ticketmaster at 931-2000 or Ovations at (508) 535-4600.



A sure sign that summer is here...BUGS. Beginning May 1, the Museum of Science opens their home to "Backyard Monsters: The World of Insects," an exhibition running through Sept. 12. This monster-size, high-tech exhibit is an exciting and educational look into the world of insects and spiders. "Backyard Monsters" features 14 hands-on "bug's eye view" stations, displays of more than 1000 actual exotic bugs from around the world, and fantasy-inspired exhibits to fascinate viewers of all ages. What fantasy inspired exhibits, you may ask? Five robotic insects, each 12 to 16 feet tall, a towering ant and a 300-pound black widow spider, for starters. The museum is open daily, from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. and Fridays until 9 p.m.. Admission is only $7 for adults, $5 for children ages 3-14 and free for children under 3. Call 723-2500 for more information.

Have you been having trouble finding "That Girl" in syndication? Well, take heart, because you can still find Marlo Thomas at the Shubert Theatre, where she settles in for a two-week engagement (from May 4-16) of "Six Degrees of Separation." This winner of the New York Drama Critic's Circle award for Best Play, has become one of the most talked about plays in years, dealing with issues of trust, race-relations and role playing in society. Inspired by a real life story, Thomas stars as the socialite wife of a Manhattan art gallery owner who has been conned into taking into their home a charismatic young man posing as Sidney Poitier's son. Tickets are priced form $30-$45 and are available through Telecharge. Call 1-800-233-3123 for more information.

No one wants to be on the business end of Hank Phillippi Ryan's slicing curiosity, for obvious reasons. Consider the sexually deviant psychologists, the ones with circumspect notions of doctor/patient relations. Dissected and exposed in one of Ryan's recent investigative reports for WHDH-TV Channel 7, most of these head-shrinkers are now out of work and slinking back under the rock from whence they emerged.

But the personal end of Ryan's curiosity is as sharp as the business end, with just a slight amount of tact thrown in to buffer it. At parties, Ryan admits she sometimes unthinkingly turns a casual conversation into an impromptu interview, often forcing her husband, Bill, to come to the rescue of the poor soul whose only mistake was to articulate an interesting occupation.

It's also hard not to feel a little for Ryan's friend, who recently rejoiced aloud about her son's just-earned scholarship, leading Ryan to ponder the breakdown of scholarship allotments. On the outside Ryan is congratulatory, but inside she's thinking about who gets what; "Boys?" she wonders. "White boys? I wonder how many black boys get scholarships? I wonder how many black girls get scholarships?"

Such is the boon, and sometimes the burden, of a good investigative reporter, and Ryan is one Boston's best and most prolific. "Everything in the world," she explains, "has a big question mark hanging over it, to me."

Hank Phillippi Ryan, sitting in her cluttered office at the Channel 7's Bulfinch Place building (located within shooting distance of Government Center), is explaining what motivates her as the station's principal investigative reporter. Through the window behind her, it's a quiet, cloudy Saturday. But here, inside the office she shares with her producer, Judy Greenspan, Ryan's boundless energy sparks the nearly-deserted office building.

Of those hanging question marks, Ryan comments further: "They're questions I try to answer. I've always been curious. I ask, 'What if? what if? what if?' all the time. And also 'why?' So much so," she says, "that it's a joke in my family."

Taped to the wall above her desk, among various quotes and photographs, hang two items. In accordance with the laws of memorabilia (in relation to the person in whose work space it's posted), these two items lend insight into Ryan's personality. The first item is a quote from ex-President Calvin Coolidge: "Persistence and determination alone are omnipotent. The slogan 'press on' has solved and always will solve the problems of the human race." When she's blocked on a story, Ryan says this quote compels her to ask one more question, make one more telephone call, press the issue just a little further.

The other item is the telephone number for the "Center For Short-Lived Phenomena." Later, Ryan mentions that her stepfather once told her that "in real life, one's talent is measured by how few phone calls it takes to find out something." It's possible that she calls the center periodically, half-expecting to confirm with a single call that her name has been added to the list of media figures that, like supernovas, recently burned out, and are no longer. Ryan's other half, of course, knows she works too damn hard to ever be a candidate for this scary list of has-beens.

The question mark most often seen by others hanging over Harriet Ann Phillippi Ryan's head revolves around the name "Hank." Maybe people are so curious because, even today, almost all of Ryan's investigative reporter contemporaries are male; was this nickname choice a sarcastic slap at that statistic?

Actually, the name was just a gift from her friends at Western College for Women in Oxford, Ohio, where she studied English, intent on eventually teaching Shakespeare to high-school seniors. Any feminist agendas are merely imagined.

How Ryan, who grew-up in semi-rural Indianapolis, deviated from this master plan to arrive in Boston is a story shared by many in her era; one of being the right person, at the right time, in the right place. An eight-time Emmy winner, including one for "Best Investigative Reporting," Ryan currently lives with her husband in Brookline, the birthplace of broadcast investigative journalism pioneer Mike Wallace. Like the spontaneous genesis of her name, Ryan's journey to assume the mantle of investigative journalist was similarly fraught with luck and happenstance. In fact, when speaking to journalism students, Ryan frequently divulges her infinitely naive, and ultimately successful, foray into journalism only after making the students promise not to attempt any duplication of her luck.

"It's hours of incredible boredom and anticipation mixed, followed by five minutes of complete terror."

In the early 1970s, at a time when the country was enthralled with two brash young Washington Post reporters and their investigative stories surrounding the Watergate Hotel break-in, Ryan was serving as assistant press secretary to a candidate in the Indiana gubernatorial race. When Ryan's horse lost, she picked herself up, looked around and made career choice number two. Effectively, she elbowed her way onto the airwaves at an Indianapolis radio station.

"I went to the biggest radio station in Indiana," she says, "and I said 'I know everything about politics, I know everybody in Indianapolis, you don't have any women working here, and your (FCC) license is up for renewal.' And then the big smile. Now, you can get a job that way, but you can't keep it that way."

And after all that, a few months later, Ryan left the radio station for Washington, D.C., where she "walked around Capitol Hill, handing out resumes door-to-door, because I thought I wanted to do something in politics." Eventually, she landed a job as press secretary for a congressman from Texas. Again, Ryan didn't stay put. Soon, Ryan says, she was on the move again, this time to the Administrative Practice and Procedures Subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee. Ironically, one of her accomplishments in her two years there was to help write amendments to the Freedom of Information Act, a necessary investigative tool for any reporter.

By the mid-1970s, Ryan had shifted still further: She was working in Rolling Stone magazine's Washington bureau, where she helped counter-culture icon/drugs and guns fiend Hunter S. Thompson (father of the hell-bent, participatory journalism style known as gonzo journalism) organize his coverage of the 1976 presidential election. Ryan also wrote a column of her own, "Capitol Chatter," where she covered everything from the Senate Special Committee on Assassinations hearings to the prom of then-President Ford's daughter. Two years after she went to work there, Rolling Stone closed its Washington bureau, leaving Ryan once again looking for work.

Pondering an offer from Washington Post editor-in-chief Ben Bradlee to write, of all things, a gossip column, Ryan returned home to Indianapolis to regroup. While considering her options, Ryan, though she lacked television reporting experience, boldly solicited the local TV stations to see if there were any vacant reporter positions. After a solid audition – "I didn't know enough to know that I should be afraid," Ryan says – she was hired to cover Indiana politics. Her first few weeks were nerve-racking, with almost every evening ending in tears.

"I didn't know what everyone was talking about," Ryan says. "There's all kinds of TV jargon that I did not understand. I did know enough to know I didn't understand it. I'd go home and say, 'I'll never be able to do this. I'll never be able to be a reporter. I just don't get it.'"

But, with a veteran photographer as her mentor, Ryan did finally get it. So well, in fact, that she eventually moved over tomovie reviewing and medical reporting, about which she also knew nothing (thus making her the perfect jargon-free reporter).

While continuing to hone her craft in Indianapolis, Ryan caught the eye of a viewer passing through Indianapolis on his way to Atlanta, and his job as news director for a station there. At the time, Ryan says, she assumed she was hired for her skills as a hot-shot reporter. It was about five years later that she learned the real reason she was offered the job: she reminded the traveling news director of his high school sweetheart. But by the time this confession surfaced, it was irrelevant to Ryan. She was keenly aware of her burgeoning talents.

Along with sports reporting, investigative journalism has traditionally been a field dominated by men, with only a few notable exceptions. Did Ryan ever bump up against sexism, or doubts of her own about pursuing this aggressive type of journalism? "[I don't think of it] as a man/woman thing," she explains, "just a hard-worker kind of thing." Ryan says she can't recall when her gender, focused in the eyes of others, has interfered with her job. In fact, she thinks that many times, it helps.

"People sometimes think women don't know as much," Ryan says, her eyes narrowing. "I've had interviews that have turned out to be quite successful because the man I'm interviewing clearly doesn't think that I could possibly know enough, or understand enough, to know as much or more than he does. They go into the interview very arrogant and come out very sorry.

"My Holy Grail is fairness and clarity," she continues. "If someone is unpleasant to me, I'll be extra pleasant back. I don't like to use my focus as a weapon in an external way – this sounds so over-analytical – I try to be open first. Then if someone is trying to fight me, I'll try not to fight back first, because they'll say more if you're not fighting back, if you're just letting them talk. By being a willow in the wind, you can find out a lot more than being Mike Wallace. But at some point you have to ask your questions and that's what I'll do. I'm not afraid to ask the questions, the key is to know when to ask."

But Ryan readily admits that sometimes a tougher approach is needed, and Ryan is prepared for the consequences of such confrontations.

"I've always told my photographers, if someone hits me, make sure you get it on tape, make sure you're rolling," she says. "Don't put down the camera to help me. Just make sure you get it."

"Everything in the world has a big question-mark hanging over it, to me."

"I've lived for hours on pizza and red Gummi bears, thinking: 'This is the wackiest job in the world.'"

When rushing into such precarious situations, Ryan adds, it's important to remember the underlying reason for doing so: to obtain answers. "I'm not just going to get video," she explains. "I'm seriously going in to get answers. I'm curious about what that will be. I truly want to know."

In such tense situations, the true professionals rise above, controlling the direction and substance of the interview, Ryan says. If not, the opportunity may slip away on a smoke screen of unchallenged denials and red-herring answers, wasting all the hours of research and preparation that lead up to that moment when you know enough to confront someone.

"If you get off the track, you're going to come away realizing that you never actually said, 'Why did you take the money?' When I'm going to do a critical interview, I do the interview with myself in my head before I go. 'If I say this, and the person says that, then I'll say this. Or if he says this, then I'll respond with this.' Often your mind just takes over when you do that, and the interview plays itself out in your head without you having to think about it. Then, when I actually do the interview, it isn't new anymore. I'm less likely to be surprised."

Although such ambush interviews are usually over in a matter of minutes, Ryan admits that it isn't all glamour and excitement beforehand. "You're sitting in a car with a photographer," she says, "and probably your producer, waiting for potentially hours and hours for somebody to come out. You can't do anything, you can't read, you have to just watch the door. I've lived for hours on pizza and red Gummi bears, thinking, 'This is the wackiest job in the world.' Here we are, three grown-ups sitting in a car waiting for someone to walk out of a building, someone who may not come out.

"It's hours of incredible boredom and anticipation mixed," she adds, "followed by five minutes of complete terror."

Although Ryan speaks with the voice of a seasoned veteran – and by the high turnover standards of television news, she is – Ryan's only been a full-time investigative reporter for five years. Ryan arrived in Boston in 1982, going to work for Channel 7 as a general assignment reporter, covering whatever happened during the course of the day. Remarkably, when compared with her current no-nonsense on-air persona, Ryan says that originally she was being assigned the "whimsy, ironic, poetic" stories, and was quickly gaining a reputation as "the funny one."

Only problem was, she says self-mockingly now, "I wanted to be the serious one."

Finally, with the 1988 presidential election approaching and the governor of the Commonwealth emerging as a national candidate, Ryan was assigned to develop "think pieces," long background stories involving time, research and creativity. Ryan says she loved the job and performed so spectacularly that, when the election was over, the station allowed her to try her hand as a full-time investigative reporter. It meant less air time for Ryan, which she says was of little concern, but offered her the freedom to develop stories over time. The experience, she says, was an epiphany.

"It was a life-changing experience, work-wise," she explains, "because I learned how much I really like taking something that's a mystery, and plowing through an incredible amount of documents and facts and materials and computer print outs and microfilm and coming up with something at the end of it. I know it sounds completely dopey, but suddenly [I knew] this is what I wanted to do. This was fulfilling."

From her initial piece, a sweeping look at the environmental history of Boston (during which she met her husband) to such award-winning stories as blowing the whistle on Massachusetts residents who register their cars in New Hampshire to avoid taxes, Ryan proved herself again and again. One of her biggest stories, the uncovering of unregulated home improvement contractors ripping off home owners in Roxbury, Dorchester and Mattapan, resulted in three new state laws protecting against such scams, reparations of almost three-quarters of a million dollars to victims and the elimination of at least nine companies engaging in such nefarious activity.

Given that credibility is the currency in the news business, it's no surprise Ryan is concerned with the constant blurring of the line between news and entertainment in the media.

"You know, I really hate it when commercials have people in them that look like reporters or anchor people," she grumps. "It's supposed to imply that [the commercials] are news, which is supposed to imply that they're true. I don't like it when the look of news gets used to give something the aura of truth. But I don't think that people are stupid. I think that people know the difference between reality, news and some entertainment show."

Still, Ryan can't deny the pressure put on reporters to come up with the next big story, and she understands how that pressure can drive some people to bend the rules, "to make dumb mistakes." But not for one second does she condone such strains on the truth.

"My mom always used to say, 'If it makes your stomach hurt, don't do it.' I have used that a million times. Would I feel comfortable telling a jury how I did it? Or even viewers, would I feel comfortable telling the people at home how I got this? If I wouldn't, then I don't."

So Hank Phillippi Ryan is honest and persistent. And to this job, which alternates at times between boring, challenging and courageous, Ryan also brings a self-depreciating sense of humor. Often, while discussing aspects and tactics of the job, Ryan will stop in mid-sentence to laugh at the seriousness it provokes in her. Yet, she doesn't deny she's a perfectionist who takes her job very seriously.

"Every story that I look at," she says, "when I look at it now, I think, 'Oh I should have said it this way, I should have written it differently, I should have organized it differently.' Every story that I've ever done, I could do better now."

Despite her type-A personality, Ryan is learning to relax. Her husband is a professor of tai chi and Ryan – self-described as a most "un-tai-chi-like person" – practices the Chinese exercise system that mixes calisthenics, meditation, self-defense and relaxation. In addition, she and a friend, Boston lawyer Jane Sender, are collaborating on novel, "a murder mystery for which we have eight chapters, and an extensive outline, and no agent," Ryan laughs.

"The way things are right now, I have what I consider to be a spectacular job," she says. "Who knows what could change? You know typical TV – Center For Short-Lived Phenomena. At any moment, things could change, but right now I have a big say in what stories I'm going to do; I have a big say in the timing. It's still fun. As long as that continues, Boston is the place for me."

And, unlike many local notables, Ryan doesn't mind the recognition she receives on the streets of Boston and Brookline. Characteristically, it becomes an additional source of motivation.

"If somebody recognizes me, that means somebody's watching," she says. "The reaction I get is quite heartwarming to me, it's a little embarrassing and it's very gratifying. What people usually say is 'Go get 'em Hank, you're so tough.' People I don't know have called to thank me for doing stories. I do try to remember that the stories I'm doing can help an individual person, someone that I don't even know. And then I hang up the phone and think 'I have to work harder. I have to work harder.'"

Of course, there are no question marks hovering around that last statement.

La Rue Newbury

Spring has finally sprung, the weather is warming up, people are starting to shed layers of clothing (although this is not necessarily a beneficial development), and slowly, our hearts turn to thoughts of outdoor cafes, people watching, and calling in sick to work for weeks at a time. This is the time of year when Newbury Street really starts to come into its own.

Newbury Street, that beacon floating up at you from the surface of any tourist map of Boston, waving its little "come hither" flag, somehow standing out from amongst the masses of plebeian attractions Boston has to offer. From whence does this appeal spring, exactly? There are, of course, other Boston locations where one may eat, stroll, or sit at an outdoor cafe, and there are unquestionably better places to park. But none have quite the cache of Newbury Street. Nowhere else do you get quite the same blend of unabashed pretentiousness, Boston traditionalism, international chic, and just plain weirdness.

One of the truly distinctive qualities of Newbury Street is the fact that you can encounter the entire gamut of Boston culture parading around in all its finery. If you want to see tourists, go to Quincy Market. If you want to see incredible preppy yuppies, go to Beacon Hill. If you want to see everybody, go to Newbury Street.

What do we mean? Glad you asked. Boston society ladies scurrying into their luncheons at the Ritz, perfectly-coifed hairdressers mincing hand-in-hand down the street, over-dressed platinum-card carrying housewives out shopping at Louis or Charles Sumner. Euro-kids deepening their tans and self-importance complexes at the sidewalk cafes, homeless people opening all the convenience store doors on the street, hoping to catch a few cents worth of the Newbury Street dream, Boston University students looking longingly in the windows of the Gap or Banana Republic.

More, you say? How about Back Bay businessmen out to lunch, artists lugging all manner of paraphernalia, models posing, would-be musicians playing air guitar outside Newbury Comics, tourists holding up traffic on the sidewalk or hanging out the windows of those god-awful Old Town Trolleys while they snap endless photographs. Real estate agents shuffling bewildered clients in and out of beautiful and over-priced square-footage, people walking anything you can think of at the end of a leash, from dogs to pigs to lizards to children. Platform-heeled fashion victims air-bussing each other on the street corners, meter maids handing out a veritable forest of parking tickets. Welcome to Newbury Street.

The place to start off any Newbury Street adventure, naturellement, is the Ritz Carlton, located on the first block of Newbury. The Ritz is the Grande Dame of Boston hotels, and while it does not have the best food in the city, and they're never going to redecorate, and it seems like everyone who goes there is either old or from out of town, long after the rest of Boston has succumbed to the encroachment of the next latest thing, the Ritz will still be serving high tea and employing elevator operators.

Start off your tour of Newbury Street with some fresh scones and coffee poured out of a silver urn by an immaculately uniformed and incredibly repressed waiter and you'll be ready to face the trials that await you out on the street. Next, better hop on over to the Baybank machine to pad your wallet against the upcoming onslaught against that bank account. Whatever else it may be, no one has ever said Newbury Street was cheap.

This first block between Arlington and Berkeley Streets is host to a number of upscale-and-beyond boutiques, where many a sugar daddy's limits have been severely tested. In fact, had you the wherewithal, it would be possible to equip your entire life from the stores on this block, as long as all you wanted to do in life was recline in expensive clothes on expensive furniture, and eat out for every single meal. Not a bad job if you can get it. Ann Taylor, Charles Sumner, Domaine and new-kid Verona will all be happy to accommodate you, should your heart's desires lie in this direction.

The next four blocks really constitute the heart and soul of Newbury Street. You have moved away from the staid influence of the Ritz and are entering the real see-and-be-seen arena. From Dartmouth through Gloucester Streets, Newbury Street takes on a circus-like atmosphere. To brave this part of the street, you should be properly attired and properly attituded. Whatever it is you wear, wear it with panache. Everybody is viciously scrutinizing everybody else, all the while trying very hard not to look like they are. So whether it's Doc Martens or Charles Jourdan, Hermés or a red bandanna, you must exhibit the utmost self-confidence and hauteur, because the claws can be sharp on this part of the street, and if you're not armored like Teflon, they can rip you to shreds.

Now would be a good time to stop and take a breather at Joe's American Cafe. If it's even a semi-nice day, the hungry hordes will be out en masse on Joe's patio, slipping the harried hostess big bills to slide them into the first available table where they can then scope the action from their privileged perches. The most impressive of the patio patrons are constantly engaged in a barrage of greetings, kissy-kissyings, and obnoxious recountings of their weekend activities, to the obvious annoyance of other clients who were foolish enough to think that one actually comes to Joe's patio to enjoy the food. Small chance. The real goal of getting out on the patio is to be a part of, if not actually the center of, the circus.

Back out on the sidewalk, you will find it increasingly necessary to step over small, dust-mop-typecanines (being walked by owners whose attitudes seem to suggest that their dogs have bigger trust funds than you do,) or a pot-bellied pig or two, purchased by some hapless sap who saw it when it was a baby and didn't realize that in a few months he/she would have a two-ton porker at the end of their leash.

But we digress. The corner of Exeter and Newbury vies with the Dartmouth corner for that center of the universe distinction, and depending on with whom you speak, may actually be winning. On the one side, you have an outlet of that national chain of mediocrity, TGIFriday's, and on the other, Euro-kid Heaven, the Harvard Bookstore Cafe. Tourists pile thankfully into Friday's, recognizing a familiar landmark that's guaranteed to be the same here as it is anywhere in the U.S.A. Meanwhile, Euros bask in the sun at little tables at the Harvard Bookstore Cafe, talking to their friends at the next table over on their ever-present cellular phones. In between all this insanity, perfectly normal people are trying to get to or from work, or do their shopping, or whatever it is that perfectly normal people do. Nobody really notices them.

Crossing over Exeter Street, there is another golden consumer opportunity at the old Prince School, which houses the Gap, Banana Republic and the Nature Company. Emporio Armani, right across the street, tops off this Euro shoppers wet dream.

Moving up Newbury to the corner of Fairfield, you encounter the odd marriage of Daisy Buchanan's and Ciao Bella, which are placed one on top of the other. Ciao Bella accommodates all the disgruntled Euro kids who couldn't get a table at Harvard Bookstore Cafe, and Daisy's accommodates all the lost Northeastern and B.U. students who stayed out too late last night and can't remember where their classes were supposed to be. It's kind of a culture clash, and both sides eye each other suspiciously, denying that the other could possibly be having more fun, while at the same time secretly afraid that they are.

Along the rest of this block is some of the best shopping on Newbury Street, in terms of both affordability and variety. Little boutiques, where you can buy anything from exotic spice racks, to pork-pie hats, to surfer gear, to a dress that makes your cleavage look like something constructed by a post-modern architect (Seletto, Topper's, Blue Planet and Starving Artist) make up for the uniformity of the upscale places at the beginning of the street.

Accordingly with the terrain, the natives start to get a little more diverse as well. More platforms heels and Doc Martins scuffle the sidewalk (if you happen to be the kind of person who checks out people's feet first), the fashion sense is closer to grunge (even though no one will admit it anymore because grunge is passé) than glamour.

All but the toughest of tourists have been weeded out by the time you get to the corner of Gloucester and Newbury. Up at this end of Newbury Street, for some reason or other, there seems to be a proliferation of realtor's offices and travel outlets; they're either trying to get you to move in or go away.

If you've actually made it this far, the last funky block of Newbury Street awaits you. You now have the opportunity to hop into Upper Newbury Pet Store and purchase that Vietnamese pot-bellied pig of your dreams. Also on this block you'll have the opportunity to improve your wardrobe to fashionably up-to-the-minute standards at John Fluevog or Urban Outfitters, where you can buy the latest platforms and bell-bottoms.

And, finally, there is Tower Records. Tower anchors this end of Newbury Street like the Ritz does the opposite end, but, you can obviously see how far we've come from the hauteur of Boston tradition with this mega-record-super market that caters to the masses of music consumers.

And there you have it: Street of Dreams or Street of Screams, Newbury in all its splendor or paucity goes way beyond being just another shopping playground for tacky tourists, or historically significant stop on the Trolley tour. The more you get to know Newbury Street, the more you can decide if you desire or despise it. Either way, it's hard to turn your back on it.

Newbury Street seduces us with its promise of glamour; it's sexy and exciting, frustrating, familiar and bizarre all at once, and maybe the only way to really look at it is as a microcosm of the world as a whole. Or maybe it's just a fun place to get dressed up and pretend to be somebody, because if there's any place in Boston that will let you get away with that, it's here. Newbury Street understands and accommodates and takes advantage of and markets the hell out of our desires and insecurities, but it's not really doing anything to you that you wouldn't do back to it in a heartbeat. Give and take, look and be looked at, pose and make fun of poseurs, all's fair out on La Rue Newbury. ◆

Falling Down

Michael Douglas, sporting a crew-cut, glasses, white button-down shirt, and a pocket protector, abandons his car in a Los Angeles traffic jam and sets out on foot for home. After exchanging his briefcase for weapons, the man known only by his license plate D-FENS explodes when confronted with the familiar stresses of urban life. Is he an average white guy who has been pushed to the edge? Or is he an over-the-edge, vigilante sociopath? This movie is sure to strike a chord with anyone who has ever had a bad day.

Groundhog Day

Bill Murray plays Phil Connors, a callous weatherman, trapped in time in Punxsutawney, Pennsylvania on Groundhog Day and forced to relive the same day over and over. (Imagine waking up to "I Got You Babe" playing on the clock radio every morning). In spite of himself, he changes into a decent human being. The lovely and clever Andie MacDowell shines; we believe that MacDowell could inspire anybody to change for the better.

Il Ladro Di Bambini (Stolen Children)

After a mother is arrested for prostituting her eleven-year-old daughter, a young military officer must escort the girl and her ten-year-old brother from Milan to a home for children. Drawing heavily on the Italian Neo-realist tradition, director Gianni Amelio quietly chronicles their journey during which the three bond and the officer realizes the extent to which the girl has been victimized. Inevitably, he too, becomes a victim. The characters are affecting the pace is slow but steady, and the bright, bleak urban landscape is haunting.

Indecent Proposal

Diana (Demi Moore) and David Murphy (Woody Harrelson) are deeply in love (they have sex and say "I love you," a lot). But they are desperate for money, so when a handsome billionaire (Robert Redford) offers them a million dollars for a night with Diana, they take him up on it. There's no denying director Adrian Lyne's considerable talent; he keeps this insubstantial soufflé rising until the very end when it collapses into a sticky puddle. Like Pretty Woman, Indecent Proposal is a cynical paean to our consumer society disguised as a romance. So why weren't Demi's clothes as nice as Julia's?

Just Another Girl on the I.R.T.

Chantel (Ariyan Johnson) is an African-American Brooklyn girl who's got smarts, looks confidence, ambition (she wants to be a doctor) and a very big mouth. When she's not studying, working, or taking care of her siblings, she hangs out with girlfriends, parties, and has a good time. How this smart kid handles getting pregnant (in spite of using birth control) is what concerns director Leslie Harris; her Chantel is a complex character whose behavior, while not always rational or admirable, is realistic. There are some awkward scenes and tone changes, but it's an impressive debut film, and Chantel is a character from whom we'd like to hear more.

INDEPENDENT'S DAY

The Last Days of Chez Nous

Directed by Gillian Armstrong. Written by Helen Garner. At the Brattle Theatre, April 30-May 13.

A decade-and-a-half of evolving women's liberation consciousness informs the best films of Australian director, Gillian Armstrong. This includes her newest, The Last Days of Chez Nous, a touching elegy to an irreparably broken modern marriage.

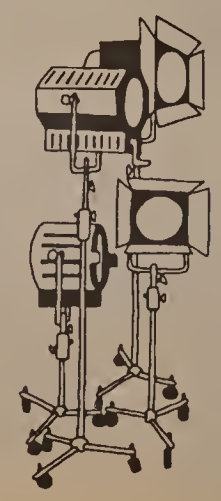
My Brilliant Career (1979), Armstrong's classic feature debut, championed a tenacious, ferociously independent young woman (Judy Davis) who rejected the most beguiling gentleman suitor, so as to be faithful to her calling as a writer. Mrs. Soffel (1981), made in Hollywood, told the sad story of a woman (Diane Keaton) so imprisoned in her stultifying marriage that she ran away with a murderer. High Tide (1987), Armstrong's masterpiece, cast Judy Davis again, this time as a worn-out backup rock singer who discovers a psychic need for the daughter she abandoned.

Think of all the women's films since the 1970s. Few reach the great emotion of these unforgettable moments in Armstrong's oeuvre: the heroine of My Brilliant Career walking triumphantly across the rural terrain with her completed book manuscript, placing it in the mailbox for publication; the protagonist of High Tide sighing from her soul because her lost daughter (who doesn't know she's her daughter) stands before her: Oh, a mother's heart!

The Last Days of Chez Nous offers Armstrong's older-and-wiser dialogue with her earlier films. The heroine, Beth (Lisa Harrow, in a wonderful performance), is unhappily married as is Mrs. Soffel, has a daughter, as in High Tide, and has chosen the "brilliant career" of writing. Beth, in her forties – here resembling Armstrong herself – is an established, Sidney-based artistic talent.

Beth works at home, sharing a lived-in flat comfortably with her teenage daughter, Annie (Miranda Otto), and shakily with her French husband, J.P. (Bruno Ganz). Are a successful occupation and a daughter's love – the things Armstrong advocated in My Brilliant Career and High Tide – sufficient for a satisfying life?

Maybe. Yet, Beth feels, at times, guilty and unfulfilled the way Armstrong insinuates, of many adult women who have grown up with feminism. Beth wonders: Is she selfish, unlovable — the judgment of her husband? Is she too competent — the vantage of her intimidated younger sister, Vicki (Kerry Fox)?



Annie (Miranda Otto), Vicki (Kerry Fox), Beth (Lisa Harrow) and J.P. (Bruno Ganz) in The Last Days of Chez Nous.

Should she want another baby? In a 1990s switch, it is J.P., the husband, who looks longingly, enviously, at a neighbor's newborn, who caresses it in his arms. Beth, in contrast, is through with children. Moreover, when sister Vicki gets pregnant, Beth is the one who marches her – too rationally – to the neighborhood abortionist.

Bad Beth? "The screenwriter, Helen Garner, was very tough on the main character, a woman with freedoms," admits Armstrong, speaking of her movie at the Berlin Film Festival. But hold tight before declaring Chez Nous a backlash, pro-family values tract.

"I would consider myself a feminist filmmaker," she adds. "I think my philosophy as a woman comes out, and I would not make a sexist work." Credit Armstrong's fair-minded humanism: all characters make sense, and all have their say. Chez Nous also can be interpreted as Feminism Defended. Just maybe Beth is fine in everything she does. Perhaps her spouse is actually the cold, bull-headed one, unable to notice Beth's emotional needs even when she crawls all over him in bed. Certainly, he's the immature, philandering one.

Maybe Beth's stress and alienation is just the 1990s human condition? Are breakups inevitable these days? "I've been with someone 23 years," Armstrong said, among the lucky ones. ❑

THE ODD COUPLES

In the Soup and Benny & Joon

BY KAJ WILSON

IN THE SOUP

Directed by Alexandre Rockwell. Written by Alexandre Rockwell and Tim Kissel. At the Coolidge Corner Theatre, opening April 30.

In the Soup, which took the 1992 Sundance Film Festival's Grand Jury Prize for Best Dramatic Feature, pairs young, naive and flat-broke filmmaker, Aldolpho Rollo (Steve Buscemi) with shady, big-hearted, exuberant Joe (Seymour Cassel). Aldolpho is an artist: "My father died the day I was born. I was raised by Fyodor Dostoyevsky and Friedrich Nietzsche. I am a filmmaker."

Joe is his unlikely patron ("I've decided I want art to be an important part of my life"), and he'd be ideal were it not for his outrageous and illegal fundraising techniques, which include stealing a Porsche from a cop's driveway. What's more, he expects Aldolpho to go along for the ride. Aldolpho does and encounters an assortment of loonies along the way. More important, he grows to love Joe, and realizes that his patron's life is a work of art and that life and art are a balanced equation, each giving the other meaning.

Director Alexandre Rockwell took Joe's good advice to Aldolpho and made a love story, a multi-layered one about movie making that combines Joe's heart with Aldolpho's artistic sense – or nonsense – ibility. In In the Soup, Rockwell pays tribute to his own "fathers" who include John Cassavetes, Godard, Truffaut, and Jim Jarmusch (who cameos as an amusing turn as a producer of a game show played in the nude). Naturally, the movie is in black and white. Jennifer Beals, who is Mr. Rockwell's wife, is convincing as Angelica, Aldolpho's fiery and snarly Latina neighbor, who is unmoved by his adoration and plans to make her star.

Steve Buscemi(front) and Seymour Cassel star in "In the Soup."

BENNY & JOON

Directed by Jeremiah Chechik. Screenplay by Barry Berman based on a story by Barry Berman and Leslie McNeil. At the Circle, Cheri.

Down-to-earth Benny (Aidan Quinn) describes his younger sister Joon (Mary Stuart Masterson) best: "She paints, she reads, she sets things on fire." Joon, you see, is mentally ill, and Benny has cared for her since their parents died twelve years earlier. They're a couple and their life together has a quirky rhythm, even if Joon drives away the help.

Enter new housekeeper Sam (Johnny Depp), the learning-disabled cousin of a poker buddy. Sam has dark flowing hair and a sweet, elegant face; his unusual garb evokes his idol Buster Keaton. Joon is intrigued from the moment she observes, "You're out of your tree," and Sam replies, "It's not my tree." These two misfits and budding artists – Sam has a gift for physical comedy – are made for each other.

But change, even for the better, means new stresses and strains. Joon breaks down and has to be hospitalized. Her breakdown is scary and convincing; for the first time, you believe she really does need medication and care, and you realize what the movie could have been: a gritty portrayal of mental illness.

Instead, director Jeremiah Chechik romanticizes Joon and Sam. When Joon is painting or when she's with Sam after they've fallen in love, her ordinary working-class home turns into a magical retreat: rooms give off an aqua-blue glow and the stream behind the house shimmers like the ocean in the moonlight.

Still, Benny & Joon is consistently entertaining, although the conclusion does feel rushed and overly optimistic. Aidan Quinn, quietly compelling as a mechanic with grease under his nails, keeps the movie from flying off to never-never land. ❑

FLICKS IN A FLASH

LIKE WATER FOR CHOCOLATE

In Mexico, the expression "like water for chocolate" means to be agitated or sexually aroused. True to it's title, director Alfonso Arau's Like Water For Chocolate, tells a tale of love, lust, food, and foment in the tradition of Latin American magic realism, but with a feminist spin. Tita (Lumi Cavazos) is a wonderful cook. Forbidden by family tradition to marry the love of her life (who marries her oldest sister instead, just to be near Tita), she expresses her sorrow, anger and passion through food. The wedding cake Tita is forced to prepare for her sister's wedding makes all the guests cry and throw up. The movie is a delightful, lively romance complete with a wicked-witch of a mother, handsome revolutionaries and leather, lace, and candles.

MAD DOG AND GLORY

Wayne Dobie (Robert De Niro), a shy evidence technician for the Chicago police, saves the life of loan shark Frank Milo (Bill Murray) who thanks Dobie with a temporary gift of the beautiful Glory (Uma Thurman). The romance that blossoms between the two of them is one of the few predictable developments in Richard Price's otherwise clever script, which fortunately focuses more on the relationship between the men. De Niro is convincing as an ordinary guy who longs to be an artist. Murray stands out as the charming, sinister, and unhappy Milo, who longs to be a stand-up comedian. mediocre material.

CLASSIC STYLE WITH AN ECCENTRIC TWIST

An Interview with Tommy Tune

BY MEGAN GILMARTIN

What's 6'6," swims in the air, and just landed in Boston's Colonial Theater? Only one of the most celebrated choreographers /directors / dancers on Broadway today. Showman Tommy Tune glided into town on April 27, ready to open "Tommy Tune Tonite!" an hour-and-a-half revue featuring singing dancers Robert Fowler and Frantz Hall, a 26-piece orchestra, a repertoire of George Gershwin, Cole Porter and Irving Berlin standards and, of course, the elegant and innovative dancing of Tune.

We caught up with Tune in Hawaii several weeks back, where he was recuperating from a working trip to Japan. He was staying in a grass shack, nestled in lava rocks at the base of Diamond Head in Honolulu, which he rented from a hula professor. Wearing nothing more than a splendid tan and a flowery lei (or so he says), Tune began the interview with his impression of the new act.

"This is a form of show that you just cannot see anymore," he says, "Nobody else is doing this...it's unique."

The show marks Tune's return as a stage performer for the first time in almost 10 years. For most of the past decade, Tune has been doing the majority of his work behind the scenes, as director and choreographer. Being back on the front line "feels great," Tune says. "Just the audience being there...the audience and the stage embrace each other."

"Tommy Tune Tonite!" is the culmination of 10 years of song and dance routines that started evolving when Tune was asked to perform at an AIDS benefit years ago. Tune started with the song-and-dance number "The Continental," and his repertoire grew from there. "I chose songs that were written before I was born," Tune says. "The great American classical popular songs from the Golden Age...it's those songs that I love."

Tune is taking those old American standards and reinventing them for our times. "I think you have to acknowledge the classics," Tune says with relaxed candor, "and then add your own peculiar twist to them. I think the whole idea is to give back, to take [from the classics], but then to give back."

Which is exactly what Tune and his big band of performers are doing. They are spinning, hoofing, and twisting old standards like "Puttin' on the Ritz," "S'Wonderful," and "You're the Top," and propelling them into state-of-the-art theater. Tune stresses that this show is theater. "It's not just a song and a dance, and a song and a dance...it's sort of all laced together."

Tune says that he does most of his creative work right before he falls asleep at night and right before he fully wakes up in the morning. "It's between the states," he says in his calm cadence, with just a hint of a Texas drawl, "that I find ideas or solutions to questions like 'How am I going to do that?" Other than his cosmic creative dreaming, Tune says he rarely finds himself anxious or stressed out. "I don't like to work that way, it's too much pressure," he explains.

Andy Warhol once said that Tommy Tune "exudes a cultivated serenity and a genuine love of life." This description suits Tune perfectly. You would think this nine-time Tony Award-Winner would be smug and overbearing. Indeed, you may find yourself wondering if his boyish exuberance and genuine nature are a disguise. They are not.

Tommy Tune, still flying high.

Tune says he is "very pleased and proud" of his accomplishments and awards. "I'm very grateful for everything that I have; the success that I have acquired through hard work," he says, adding that he takes nothing for granted.

Tune concludes the interview by describing his personal performance-night ritual. He starts off by leading his cast and crew in their version of prayer. "The cast and I join hands," he says, "and we ask, 'May we please be the best that we can be.' And then, we have this thing where we bend our knees, and we jump very high...and then we shout 'Gam-Ba-Tei!' That's Japanese for 'Do Your Best!'" And upon landing, that's exactly what they will do...their best. ❑

"Tommy Tune Tonight!" is playing at the Colonial Theater (106 Boylston Street) through May 2. Call 426-6444 for ticket information and reservations. Tickets range from $20-$47.50.

STAGE NOTES

"Annie Get Your Gun," Irving Berlin's 1946 musical, plays at the Colonial Theatre in a two week engagement, May 4-16. Cathy Rigby, the gymnast turned actress who was last here in "Peter Pan," plays the sharp-shooting Annie Oakley. Brent Barrett also stars. The show's director, choreographer, and scenic designer all worked on "The Secret Garden." Catherine Zuber from the American Repertory Theatre designed the costumes.

The American Repertory Theatre is bringing back its acclaimed production of Harold Pinter's "The Caretaker" for a limited run, beginning May 21, at the Hasty Pudding Theater. This will be preceded by, and then play in repertory with, David Rabe's new play, "Those the River Keeps," which begins performances May 6.

The ART has also announced that Elaine Stritch, who has had numerous roles on Broadway and in London, will lead the cast of the world premiere of "Cakewalk" – Peter Feibleman's semi-autobiographical account of his turbulent 40-year relationship with playwright Lillian Hellman. This will be the last production of the main stage season. For information about all events, call 547-8300.

"Go On, Punch Me In The Stomach," a bittersweet comedy by Deb Filler, a native New Zealander, returns to the local area May 1-2, at the Leventhal Sidman Jewish Community Center in Newton. The actress portrays more than 30 characters from her far-flung extended family; but under the hilarity and affectionate parodying in this solo outing, there is the shadow of being a Holocaust survivor's child. Ms. Filler's piece received good notices last year, and an extra performance has been added for Sunday night. For information call 965-5226.

Radio personality Jess Cain, the former morning man on WHDH, will appear in Arthur Miller's "The Price" at the Lyric Stage, for five weeks, through May 23. The play examines the relationship of two long estranged brothers who meet after many years to dispose of their late father's belongings which have been stored in an attic. For information, call 437-7172.

The Publick Theatre has announced its 1993 summer season which will begin June 2. The three-play season will include Gilbert & Sullivan's "The Pirates of Penzance," June 2-27; William Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," July 7-August 1; and the Burt Shevelove/Larry Gelbart/Stephen Sondheim musical, "A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum," August 11-September 5. Performances are Wednesday through Sunday, weather permitting, at the outdoor theater in Christian A. Herter Park on Soldiers Field Road in Brighton, directly across from WBZ-TV.

"Spike Heels," a comedy by former Boston playwright Theresa Rebeck, is being presented by the New Theatre (formerly the New Ehrlich), April 22-May 15, at the 1st and 2nd Church Theatre, 66 Marlborough Street, in the Back Bay. The work, which reverses traditional stereotypes and addresses matters of seduction and sexual harassment in the modern workplace, received rave reviews in an off-Broadway production, which just closed after a long run. For tickets and information, call 247-7388.

SILENCE, CUNNING EXILE

Woman in Search of Herself

BY NANCY LEONARD

"Silence, Cunning, Exile," which is the opening production at the American Repertory Theatre's New Stages Series, is billed as an exploration of the creative impulse, focusing on how one artist's search for expression degenerates into obsession. But on the stage of the Hasty Pudding Theatre, Stuart Greenman's cinematically scripted work seems to be as much about the origins of feminism as about art.

The work was inspired by the life of Diane Arbus, a fashion photographer who turned to capturing the dark underside of society in the prosperous, consumer-oriented 1950s. Abandoning her well-to-do family life for the camera's lure, she was quickly caught up in the world she photographed, with sordid self-destruction a ready exchange for her highly-praised art.

Sordidness aside, the journey from domesticity to self-expression was a common cause at the time – first dimly perceived, then given voice by Betty Friedan's pivotal work, The Feminist Mystique. Those activist sentiments are commonplace now, but the first half of Greenman's play, beginning in 1950, summons these images from the formative years.

Suzie, his central character, is a creative woman, living a resolutely normal life with a devoted husband and child, frolicking with close friends at the Vineyard. In New York, she and her husband are "the people to meet" in the fashion business. Shadows, though, dot the landscape, serious contemplation undercutting the gloss. Suzie remarks she's "not depressed, just moribund."

The spark of excitement, flickering in some off-beat fashion sessions, is fanned by an adulterous encounter into a full-scale flame. Suzie's inwardly raging appetite leads her to the city's freak shows, trash-filled streets, and subways – her camera begging for entrance to a world of one-night stands, where exhilaration dances tightly with empty rejection. The playwright may have intended to write about art, not feminism, but it is striking that in her degeneration, Suzie is unwilling to break with her family, and in the depths of despair, summons Vineyard memories and begs for connections long severed by her obsession. No good, though, can come of this life; only oblivion and reputation.

The play is constructed as a series of short scenes, each wrapped around a single thematic point. There are probably more scenes than necessary, but director Ron Daniels keeps them all taut and forward moving. Still, the quick cuts and somewhat stylized tone make this a less than compelling exploration. The interruptions and distancing outweigh any mood, and little seems provocative.

The tawdry elements are partly dramatized (a lesbian relationship with a model, a self-loathing transvestite, a rotund whore eating birthday cake and cackling about her celebrity) and partly narrated (a sexual encounter with a midget, a 4 a.m. foray into the subways) but they generally have the same spareness as everything else. It is only when the author allows himself a bit of extended voice – largely a narrative one – that the depictions take on a certain life.

We can see Suzie's quiet compulsion, her passion to be seduced by her subjects, her endless weary trek to the next "appointment," but her journey to annihilation does not inherently suggest artistic genius or contain any explanation for its course. Greenman's work – whose title comes from James Joyce's rallying cry for artists - is long on portrayal, short on insight.

The evening is endowed with some wonderful performances by ART heavyweights. Stephanie Roth (first with flowing tresses, then with close-cropped hair) makes Suzie a chilly figure from the outset, with forced protestations of happiness early on, and genuine excitement only in a few photographic moments at the withered close. Royal Miller, an immensely appealing actor, is supreme as her devoted husband, Donald, who continues his support long after they split.

Jonathan Fried brings nice boyish appeal to Frank, the love-struck friend who rouses Suzie from her moribund domesticity, and carries the torch through their respective troubles. There's a stunning contribution by Candy Buckley as Frank's wife, Beryl, who despite early affliction turns out to be a hardy, if bruised, survivor. Her final scene with Roth, resonating with hurt and desire, is the strongest in the work. Alvin Epstein plays the mentoring Isaac Miller with a precise combination of control, envy, and admiration – "a well-meaning SOB." Leslie Beatty could be a bit stronger as Kiki, the model with a dark agenda. Remo Airaldi's prostitute and John Payne's transvestite are sharply drawn.

Christine Jones' spare set relies on a blank wall and doorway for most of its impact. John Abrosone's widely varied lighting adds a strong dramatic element while Karen Eister's costumes, particularly Suzie's darkening attire, are skillfully evocative.

Though intended as a study of artistic obsession, this rudimentarily crafted play summons images of feminist yearnings – maybe that's why "Desperately Seeking Susan" seems such an apt subtitle. ❑

CELEBERITY GUEST DINING REVIEW

Thai Times at Bangkok Bistro

BY ROBERTA DEHMAN HERSHON

The good news is, Bangkok Bistro is worth the trip. The bad news is, parking anywhere near this Cleveland Circle eatery can be a nightmare. However, once the car is safely tucked away (avoid those resident parking spots), you can prepare yourself for some of the most interesting and well-priced Thai food in Boston. For those wishing to avoid the parking anxiety, take the T to Cleveland Circle. The open kitchen and detailed menu add a bit of excitement to your whole dining experience.

This five-year-old establishment tries hard to please. Food arrives as soon as it's cooked. The waitstaff is helpful without being intrusive. Even when all 56 seats are taken, and there's a wait for a table, diners are never hurried.

Our party feasted on dishes ranging from mild to fiery. Contrary to popular belief, not all Thai food is spicy; some offerings are not hot at all. With the exception of one dish (Fisherman's Delight), we thought that the number of chili peppers displayed next to each item at Bangkok Bistro carried an accurate capsicum rating.

For starters, we found the beef and chicken Satay ($4.75 each) with a tasty side of peanut sauce nicely executed. Salad Khag ($2.95), which carries one chili pepper, was a crisp blend of greens, cucumbers and tomatoes offset with cubes of fried tofu and slices of hard boiled eggs, accompanied by a zippy peanut dressing.

For entrees, there were a number of winners. Bangkok Bistro's chefs are quite talented in the seafood department; however, as previously mentioned, their Fisherman's Delight ($11. 25) is a bit more palate-searing than the menu states. The healthy portion of shrimp, scallops, and cod, stir-fried with assorted vegetables and bathed in a hot chili sauce, needs a side of rice to cool the heat. Seashore sauté ($11.25) combines shrimp, scallops, and squid with flash-cooked onions and vegetables in a roasted chili sauce. Both these dishes carry a one chili pepper rating.

Their superb Pad Thai ($6.25) is a classic blend of soft noodles, tofu, and perfectly cooked shrimp, chicken, and eggs sprinkled with roasted peanuts. Bistro fried rice ($6.25) was another story. It arrived as a bland melange of under-seasoned, gluey rice laced with chicken, shrimp, pineapple, and onions.

One Night in Bangkok ($7.95 for either chicken or beef), billed as their hottest dish, lived up to its name. With burning lips and watery eyes, we all agreed it was hot, but not overpowering. Again, a side of white rice is needed.

We could not get enough of the peanut sauce, and so ordered the Rama Garden, a mildly spiced array of colorful vegetables coated with this robust mixture of peanut butter and coconut milk. The two-chili-pepper rated beef basil ($8.50) marries slices of beef with onions, bamboo shoots, green peppers, and fragrant basil leaves in a garlic chili sauce.

With influences from China and India, the coconut-based curries – red, green, Masaman, and yellow – are not to be missed. Diners can select vegetable ($6.95), chicken ($7.95), beef ($8.50), shrimp ($9.95) or duck ($9.50).

Desserts, other than fresh fruit, are rare in Asian countries. Fortunately, they have stayed clear of anything canned. A dish of soothing coconut or ginger ice cream ($2.35) is a creamy, but not very satisfying, finale (neither the coconut nor the ginger flavors are assertive enough). A tray of half a dozen American pastries ($3.35 each), ranging from chocolate cake to a lime tart, was brought to our table for inspection. We chose and ate all six. Each had its merits, but none were outstanding.

The restaurant offers a Saturday brunch (noon to 3:30 p.m.) with home-style cooking not found on the regular menu. Homesick Thai students and those in the know flock to Bangkok Bistro for these once a week specialties priced at $5 to $6. There's no steam table in sight. These dishes are cooked to order. Go early. They are usually sold out by 1:30 p.m. ❑

Our celebrity reviewer, Roberta Dehman Hershon, is a chef and president of Blue Plate Communications, a Boston public relations agency specializing in the food industry.

STAY TUNED

Julia Child is in the kitchen again this fall with a new 16-part series called "Cooking with Master Chefs." From her home in Cambridge, the French chef will introduce a nationally-recognized master chef. The show will then feature the master chef teaching in his or her own home kitchen. Oriented towards the serious home cook, the program will spend more time on technique and ingredients. No time slot has yet been scheduled for the new show, but not to worry about gathering an audience. Whenever Julia appears, culinary aficionados are sure to beat a path to their televisions.

HEAVY ON THE SAUCE

Dierdre Davis has a new book that places the art of sauce-making within reach, even for the beginner. It is called A Fresh Look at Saucing Foods. Ms. Davis began her culinary career as a student of Madeleine Kamman and is currently vice president of the Women's Culinary Guild of New England.

Through The Wine Glass

Tastings in the Dark

BY SANDY BLOCK, MW

The first time I heard the phrase "blind wine-tasting," I imagine I pictured a bunch of overdressed geeks in a candle-lit room playing some variation of Pin the Tail on the Donkey while they fumbled around a goblet of Chateau Margaux. If it were only that easy! Tasting and trying to accurately describe wine without knowing its identity is often a humbling, confidence-shattering exercise even for the most experienced professional. To master the relevant skills requires patience, concentration and, above all, disciplined practice. Not exactly your average party fare.

The world of wine is full of fluff, pretense and mystique. Self-styled experts abound. Few among the many "authorities" presuming to guide popular tastes have ever learned to critically judge wine quality without knowing beforehand the reputation of the producer, the appellation, or the vintage. How much trust should we give writers and merchants who let themselves form opinions over elaborate winemaker-hosted dinners or during the course of expenses-paid junkets to the winery?

Knowing how to taste with accuracy has never been a job requirement for selling or writing about wine in this country. But an ability to make assessments "blind" is, in my opinion, the foundation of all useful wine knowledge. On what other basis should consumers accept judgments of quality? Most people, after all, really want concrete information. How does it taste? What are its qualities? How does it compare to others? Is it a value?

The moment of truth comes when we experience an anonymous wine in the glass without any clue as to what it is other than those provided by eyes, nose and palate. Tasting outside the familiar reference points, all the ultimately trivial and irrelevant gossip that passes as insider knowledge, will provide unprejudiced answers to most of the questions consumers have. Rather than allowing one to form conclusions beforehand, it forces a measure of concentration on the wine's actual characteristics.

The fact is that wines each have distinct origins and identities; they can speak to us in an eloquent voice if we still our thoughts enough to be able to hear. At first, the sounds might be as foreign and fleeting as vague whispers. However, focus and training may enable us to follow each twist of the story. A glass of wine can say how it was made and where; how long ago and with which grape varieties. The tale can be passionate and dramatic, or even quite moving in its beauty. Mostly, however, the facts speak simply and without fanfare.

The key is to let the story emerge from the glass, to face each new wine as a complete unknown. Clear but surprising preferences may result. Without thinking that we must revere a wine because it is rare or highly sought-after, we may find ourselves better satisfied by a humbler bottle. We may even begin to accept that there is no right or wrong, but that the less exalted wine simply appeals to us more.

The way we describe wine is inescapably personal. People each have a unique set of sensory equipment, with different palate thresholds for perceiving sugar, acidity, tannin and other wine components.

Because what I taste differs from what you taste, the words describing these sensations always fall somewhat short of precise communication. A professional taster needs to develop his own language to assess and remember his experience of wine components. What matters is not the terms some outside authority uses to describe Sauvignon Blanc, for instance, but how its essential aromas register to you, inside. Reading somebody's wine-tasting notes and trying to find these exact characteristics again yourself is most often an exercise in futility.

Wine is laden with mystery and magic and beauty. Technical tasting notes should rarely, in my opinion, be published because they communicate none of these dimensions, and only in the most general way do they give one a sense of how wines taste. Sometimes it appears that their real function is to show off all the exotic aromas and flavors one's imagination is capable of conjuring. In general, readers find them intimidating. For this reason, and because few things about wine have ever proved less pleasurable to me than pouring over other people's tasting notes, they will appear at a minimum in this column.

Although often spoon-fed misleading and superficial information, subjected to quasi-promotional hype masquerading as objective journalism, and assaulted by aggressive tasting notes, wine consumers are a resilient lot, hungry for genuine knowledge. They sense that the pure love of wine they experience at the dinner table, the life-enhancing enjoyment they derive, has nothing to do with these games. Honest journalists who share that love will respect it enough to report only on their authentic encounters with wines tasted in the dark, as it were, through the wine glass. ❑

Along with being a Master of Wine, Sandy Block has functioned as sommelier and wine director for the Mill Falls Restaurant, as the on-premise wine manager at The Branded-New England Company in Norwood, as sommelier and wine purchaser for Le Bocage in Watertown, and as the former wine columnist for the Boston Tab.
